PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Many important subjects will claim your attention during the present session, of which I shall endeavor to give, in aid of your deliberations, a just idea in this communication. I undertake this duty with diffidence, from the vast extent of the interests on which I have to treat, and of their great importance to every portion of our Union. I enter on it with zeal, from a thorough conviction that there never was a period, since the establishment of our Revolution, when, regarding the condition of the civilized world, and its bearing on us, there was greater necessity for devotion in the public servants to their respective duties, or for virtue, patriotism, and union, in our constituents.

Meeting in you a new Congress, I deem it proper to present this view of public affairs in greater detail than might otherwise be necessary. I do it, however, with peculiar satisfaction, from a knowledge that, in this respect, I shall comply more fully with the sound principles of our Government. The people being with us exclusively the sovereign, it is indispensable that full information be laid before them on all important subjects, to enable them to exercise that high power with complete effect. If kept in the dark, they must be incompetent to it. We are all liable to error, and those who are engaged in the management of public affairs are more subject to excitement, and to be led astray by their particular interests and passions, than the great body of our constituents, who, living at home, in the pursuit of their ordinary avocations, are calm but deeply interested spectators of events, and of the conduct of those who are parties to them. To the people, every Department of the Government, and every individual in each, are responsible, and the more full their information, the better they can judge of the wisdom of the policy pursued, and of the conduct of each in regard to it. From their dispassionate judgment, much aid may always be obtained, while their approbation will form the greatest incentive, and most gratifying reward, for virtuous actions, and the dread of their censure the best security against the abuse of their confidence. Their interests, in all vital questions, are the same, and the bond by sentiment, as well as by interest, will be proportionably strengthened as they are better informed of the real state of public affairs, especially in difficult conjunctures. It is by such knowledge that local prejudices and jealousies are surmounted, and that a national policy, extending its fostering care and protection to all the great interests of our Union, is formed and steadily adhered to.

A precise knowledge of our relations with foreign Powers, as respects our negotiations and transactions with each, is thought to be particularly necessary. Equally necessary is it, that we should form a just estimate of our resources, revenue, and progress in every kind of improvement connected with the national prosperity and public defence. It is by rendering justice to other nations, that we may expect it from them. It is by our ability to resent injuries, and redress wrongs, that we may avoid them.

The Commissioners under the fifth article of the Treaty of Ghent, having disagreed in their opinions respecting that portion of the boundary between the territories of the United States and of Great Britain, the establishment of which had been submitted to them, have made their respective reports, in compliance with that article, that the same might be referred to the decision of a friendly Power. It being manifest, however, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for any Power to perform that office, without great delay and much inconvenience to itself, a proposal has been made by this Government, and acceded to by that of Great Britain, to endeavor to establish that boundary by amicable negotiation. It appearing, from long experience, that no satisfactory arrangement could be formed of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in this hemisphere, by legislative acts, while each party pursued its own course, without agreement or concert with the other, a proposal has been made to the British Government to regulate this commerce by treaty, as it has been to arrange, in like manner, the just claim of the citizens of the United States inhabiting the States and Territories bordering on the lakes and rivers which empty into the St. Lawrence, to the navigation of that river to the ocean. For these and other objects, of high importance to the interests of both parties, a negotiation has been opened with the British Government which, it is hoped, will have a satisfactory result.

The Commissioners under the sixth and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, having successfully closed their labors in relation to the sixth, have proceeded to the discharge of those relating to the seventh. Their progress in the extensive survey, required for the performance of their duties, justifies the presumption that it will be completed in the ensuing year.

The negotiation which had been long depending with the French Government on several important subjects, and particularly for a just indemnity for losses sustained in the late wars by the citizens of the United States, under unjustifiable seizures and confiscations of their property, has not, as yet, had the desired effect. As this claim rests on the same principle with others which have been admitted by the French Government, it is not perceived on what just ground it can be rejected. A Minister will be immediately appointed to proceed to France, and resume the negotiation on this and other subjects which may arise between the two nations.

At the proposal of the Russian Imperial Government, made through the Minister of the Emperor residing here, a full power and instructions have been transmitted to the Minister of the United States at St. Petersburg, to arrange, by amicable negotiation, the respective rights and interests of the two nations on the northwest coast of this continent. A similar proposal had been made by His Imperial Majesty to the Government of Great Britain, which has likewise been acceded to. The Government of the United States has been desirous, by this friendly proceeding, of manifesting the great value which they have invariably attached to the friendship of the Emperor, and their solicitude to cultivate the best understanding with his Government. In the discussions to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power.

Since the close of the last session of Congress, the commissioners and arbitrators for ascertaining and determining the amount of indemnification which may be due to citizens of the United States, under the decision of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, in conformity to the convention concluded at St. Petersburg, on the twelfth of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, have assembled in this city, and organized themselves as a board for the performance of the duties assigned to them by that treaty. The commission constituted under the eleventh article of the treaty of twenty-second February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, between the United States and Spain, is also in session here; and as the term of three years, limited by the treaty for the execution of the trust, will expire before the period of the next regular meeting of Congress, the attention of the Legislature will be drawn to the measures which may be necessary to accomplish the objects for which the commission was instituted.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted at their last session, instructions have been given to all the Ministers of the United States accredited to the Powers of Europe and America, to propose the proscription of the African slave trade, by classing it under the denomination, and inflicting on its perpetrators the punishment of piracy. Should this proposal be acceded to, it is not doubted that this odious and criminal practice will be promptly and entirely suppressed. It is earnestly hoped that it will be acceded to, from a firm belief that it is the most effectual expedient that can be adopted for the purpose.

At the commencement of the recent war between France and Spain, it was declared by the French Government that it would grant no commission to privateers, and that neither the commerce of Spain herself, nor of neutral nations, should be molested by the naval force of France, except in the breach of a lawful blockade. This declaration, which appears to have been faithfully carried into effect, concurring with principles proclaimed and cherished by the United States, from the first establishment of their independence, suggested the hope that the time had arrived when the proposal for adopting it as a permanent and invariable rule in all future maritime wars might meet the favorable consideration of the great European Powers. Instructions have accordingly been given to our Ministers with France, Russia, and Great Britain, to make those proposals to their respective Governments; and, when the friends of humanity reflect on the essential amelioration to the condition of the human race, which would result from the abolition of private war on the sea, and on the great facility by which it might be accomplished, requiring only the consent of a few sovereigns, an earnest hope is indulged that these overtures will meet with an attention, animated by the spirit in which they were made, and that they will ultimately be successful.

The Ministers who were appointed to the Republics of Colombia and Buenos Ayres, during the last session of Congress, proceeded, shortly afterwards, to their destinations. Of their arrival there, official intelligence has not yet been received. The Minister appointed to the Republic of Chili will sail in a few days. An early appointment will also be made to Mexico. A Minister has been received from Colombia, and the other Governments have been informed that Ministers, or diplomatic agents of inferior grade, would be received from each, accordingly as they might prefer the one or the other.

The Minister appointed to Spain proceeded, soon after his appointment, for Cadiz, the residence of the Sovereign to whom he was accredited. In approaching that port, the frigate which conveyed him was warned off by the commander of the French squadron, by which it was blockaded, and not permitted to enter, although apprized, by the captain of the frigate, of the public character of the person whom he had on board, the landing of whom was the sole object of his proposed entry. This act, being considered an infringement of the rights of ambassadors and of nations, will form a just cause of complaint to the Government of France, against the officer by whom it was committed.

The actual condition of the public finances more than realizes the favorable anticipations that were entertained of it at the opening of the last session of Congress. On the first of January there was a balance in the Treasury of four millions two hundred and thirty-seven thousand four hundred and twenty-seven dollars and fifty-five cents. From that time to the thirtieth of September, the receipts amounted to upwards of sixteen millions one hundred thousand dollars, and the expenditures to eleven millions four hundred thousand dollars. During the fourth quarter of the year, it is estimated that the receipts will at least equal the expenditures, and that there will remain in the Treasury, on the first day of January next, a surplus of nearly nine millions of dollars.

On the first of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-five, a large amount of the war debt, and a part of the Revolutionary debt, become redeemable. Additional portions of the former will continue to become redeemable, annually, until the year eighteen hundred and thirty-five. It is believed, however, that, if the United States remain at peace, the whole of that debt may be redeemed by the ordinary revenue of those years, during that period, under the provision of the act of March third, eighteen hundred and seventeen, creating the Sinking Fund; and in that case the only part of the debt that will remain, after the year eighteen hundred and thirty-five, will be the seven millions of five per cent. stock subscribed to the Bank of the United States, and the three per cent. Revolutionary debt, amounting to thirteen millions two hundred and ninety-six thousand and ninety-nine dollars and six cents, both of which are redeemable at the pleasure of the Government.

The state of the Army, and its organization and discipline, has been gradually improving for several years, and has now attained a high degree of perfection. The military disbursements have been regularly made, and the accounts regularly and promptly rendered for settlement. The supplies of various descriptions have been of good quality, and regularly issued at all of the posts. A system of economy and accountability has been introduced into every branch of the service, which admits of little additional improvement. This desirable state has been attained by the act reorganizing the staff of the Army, passed on the fourteenth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen.

The moneys appropriated for fortifications have been regularly and economically applied, and all the works advanced as rapidly as the amount appropriated would admit. Three important works will be completed in the course of the year; that is, Fort Washington, Fort Delaware, and the fort at the Rigolets, in Louisiana.

The Board of Engineers, and the Topographical corps, have been in constant and active service, in surveying the coast, and projecting the works necessary for its defence.

The Military Academy has attained a degree of perfection in its discipline and instruction, equal, it is believed, to any institution of its kind in any country.

The money appropriated for the use of the Ordnance department has been regularly and economically applied. The fabrication of arms at the national armories, and by contract with the department, has been gradually improving in quality and cheapness. It is believed that their quality is now such as to admit of but little improvement.

The completion of the fortifications renders it necessary that there should be a suitable appropriation for the purpose of fabricating the cannon and carriages necessary for those works.

Under the appropriation of five thousand dollars for exploring the Western waters for the location of a site for a Western armory, a commission was instituted, consisting of Colonel McRee, Colonel Lee, and Captain Talcott, who have been engaged in exploring the country. They have not yet reported the result of their labors, but it is believed that they will be prepared to do it at an early part of the session of Congress.

During the month of June last, General Ashley and his party, who were trading under a license from the Government, were attacked by the Ricarees while peaceably trading with the Indians, at their request. Several of the party were killed and wounded, and their property taken or destroyed.

Colonel Leavenworth, who commanded Fort Atkinson, at the Council Bluffs, the most western post, apprehending that the hostile spirit of the Ricarees would extend to other tribes in that quarter, and that thereby the lives of the traders on the Missouri, and the peace of the frontier, would be endangered, took immediate measures to check the evil.

With a detachment of the regiment stationed at the Bluffs, he successfully attacked the Ricaree village, and it is hoped that such an impression has been made on them, as well as on the other tribes on the Missouri, as will prevent a recurrence of future hostility.

The report of the Secretary of War, which is herewith transmitted, will exhibit, in greater detail, the condition of the department in its various branches, and the progress which has been made in its administration, during the three first quarters of the year.

I transmit a return of the militia of the several States, according to the last reports which have been made by the proper officers in each, to the Department of War. By reference to this return, it will be seen that it is not complete, although great exertions have been made to make it so. As the defence, and even the liberties of the country, must depend, in times of imminent danger, on the militia, it is of the highest importance, that it be well organized, armed, and disciplined, throughout the Union. The report of the Secretary of War shows the progress made during the three first quarters of the present year, by the application of the fund appropriated for arming the militia. Much difficulty is found in distributing the arms according to the act of Congress providing for it, from the failure of the proper departments in many of the States, to make regular returns. The act of May the twelfth, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, provides that the system of tactics and regulations of the various corps of the regular Army, shall be extended to the militia. This act has been very imperfectly executed, from the want of uniformity in the organization of the militia, proceeding from the defects of the system itself, and especially in its application to that main arm of the public defence. It is thought that this important subject, in all its branches, merits the attention of Congress.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy, which is now communicated, furnishes an account of the administration of that department, for the three first quarters of the present year, with the progress made in augmenting the Navy, and the manner in which the vessels in commission have been employed.

The usual force has been maintained in the Mediterranean sea, the Pacific ocean, and along the Atlantic coast, and has afforded the necessary protection to our commerce in those seas.

In the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico, our naval force has been augmented, by the addition of several small vessels, provided for by the "act authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy," passed by Congress at their last session. That armament has been eminently successful in the accomplishment of its object. The piracies by which our commerce in the neighborhood of the Island of Cuba had been afflicted, have been repressed, and the confidence of our merchants, in a great measure, restored.

The patriotic zeal and enterprise of Commodore Porter, to whom the command of the expedition was confided, has been fully seconded by the officers and men under his command. And, in reflecting with high satisfaction, on the honorable manner in which they have sustained the reputation of their country and its Navy, the sentiment is alloyed only by a concern, that, in the fulfilment of that arduous service, the diseases incident to the season, and to the climate in which it was discharged, have deprived the nation of many useful lives, and among them of several officers of great promise.

In the month of August, a very malignant fever made its appearance at Thompson's Island, which threatened the destruction of our station there. Many perished, and the commanding officer was severely attacked. Uncertain as to his fate, and knowing that most of the medical officers had been rendered incapable of discharging their duties, it was thought expedient to send to that post an officer of rank and experience, with several skilful surgeons, to ascertain the origin of the fever, and the probability of its recurrence there in future seasons; to furnish every assistance to those who were suffering, and, if practicable, to avoid the necessity of abandoning so important a station. Commodore Rodgers, with a promptitude which did him honor, cheerfully accepted that trust, and has discharged it in the manner anticipated from his skill and patriotism. Before his arrival, Commodore Porter, with the greater part of the squadron, had removed from the island, and returned to the United States, in consequence of the prevailing sickness. Much useful information has however been obtained, as to the state of the island, and great relief afforded to those who had been necessarily left there.

Although our expedition, co-operating with an invigorated administration of the government of the Island of Cuba, and with the corresponding active exertions of a British naval force in the same seas, have almost entirely destroyed the unlicensed piracies from that island, the success of our exertions has not been equally effectual to suppress the same crime, under other pretences and colors, in the neighboring island of Porto Rico. They have been committed there under the abusive issue of Spanish commissions. At an early period of the present year, remonstrances were made to the Governor of that island, by an agent, who was sent for the purpose, against those outrages on the peaceful commerce of the United States, of which many had occurred. That officer, professing his own want of authority to make satisfaction for our just complaints, answered only by a reference of them to the Government of Spain. The Minister of the United States to that Court was specially instructed to urge the necessity of the immediate and effectual interposition of that Government, directing restitution and indemnity for wrongs already committed, and interdicting the repetition of them. The Minister, as has been seen, was debarred access to the Spanish Government, and, in the mean time, several new cases of flagrant outrage have occurred, and citizens of the United States in the Island of Porto Rico have suffered, and others been threatened with assassination, for asserting their unquestionable rights, even before the lawful tribunals of the country.

The usual orders have been given to all our public ships, to seize American vessels engaged in the slave trade, and bring them in for adjudication, and I have the gratification to state, that not one so employed has been discovered, and there is good reason to believe that our flag is now seldom, if at all, disgraced by that traffic.

It is a source of great satisfaction, that we are always enabled to recur to the conduct of our Navy with pride and commendation. As a means of national defence, it enjoys the public confidence, and is steadily assuming additional importance. It is submitted, whether a more efficient and equally economical organization of it might not, in several respects, be effected. It is supposed that higher grades than now exist by law, would be useful. They would afford well-merited rewards to those who have long and faithfully served their country; present the best incentives to good conduct, and the best means of insuring a proper discipline; destroy the inequality in that respect between military and naval services; and relieve our officers from many inconveniences and mortifications, which occur when our vessels meet those of other nations—ours being the only service in which such grades do not exist.

A report of the Postmaster General, which accompanies this communication, will show the present state of the Post Office Department, and its general operations for some years past.

There is established by law eighty-eight thousand six hundred miles of post roads, on which the mail is now transported eighty-five thousand seven hundred miles; and contracts have been made for its transportation on all the established routes, with one or two exceptions. There are five thousand two hundred and forty post offices in the Union, and as many postmasters. The gross amount of postage which accrued from the first of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, to the first of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, was one million one hundred and fourteen thousand three hundred and forty-five dollars and twelve cents. During the same period, the expenditures of the Post Office Department amounted to one million one hundred and sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and eighty-five dollars and fifty-one cents; and consisted of the following items: compensation to postmasters, three hundred and fifty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety-five dollars and ninety-eight cents; incidental expenses, thirty thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars and thirty-seven cents; transportation of the mail, seven hundred and eighty-four thousand six hundred dollars and eight cents; payments into the Treasury, four hundred and twenty-three dollars and eight cents. On the first of July last, there was due to the Department, from postmasters, one hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars and twenty-eight cents; from late postmasters and contractors, two hundred and fifty-six thousand seven hundred and forty-nine dollars and thirty-one cents; making a total amount of balances due to the Department, of three hundred and ninety-one thousand nine hundred and ninety-four dollars and fifty-nine cents. These balances embrace all delinquencies of postmasters and contractors, which have taken place since the organization of the Department. There was due by the Department to contractors on the first day of July last, twenty-six thousand five hundred and forty-eight dollars and sixty-four cents.

The transportation of the mail, within five years past, has been greatly extended, and the expenditures of the Department proportionably increased. Although the postage, which has accrued within the last three years, has fallen short of the expenditures two hundred and sixty-two thousand eight hundred and twenty-one dollars and forty-six cents, it appears that collections have been made, from the outstanding balances, to meet the principal part of the current demands.

It is estimated that not more than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the above balances can be collected, and that a considerable part of this sum can only be realized by a resort to legal process. Some improvement in the receipts for postage, is expected. A prompt attention to the collection of moneys received by postmasters, it is believed, will enable the Department to continue its operations without aid from the Treasury, unless the expenditure shall be increased by the establishment of new mail routes.

A revision of some parts of the post office law may be necessary; and it is submitted, whether it would not be proper to provide for the appointment of postmasters, where the compensation exceeds a certain amount, by nomination to the Senate, as other officers of the General Government are appointed.

Having communicated my views to Congress, at the commencement of the last session, respecting the encouragement which ought to be given to our manufactures, and the principle on which it should be founded, I have only to add, that those views remain unchanged, and that the present state of those countries with which we have the most immediate political relations, and greatest commercial intercourse, tends to confirm them. Under this impression, I recommend a review of the tariff, for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with for defence and independence of the country.

The actual state of the public accounts, furnishes additional evidence of the efficiency of the present system of accountability, in relation to the public expenditure. Of the moneys drawn from the Treasury, since the fourth of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, the sum remaining unaccounted for, on the thirtieth of September last, is more than a million and a half of dollars less than on the thirtieth of September preceding; and during the same period, a reduction of nearly a million of dollars has been made in the amount of the unsettled accounts for moneys advanced previously to the fourth of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen. It will be obvious that, in proportion as the mass of accounts of the latter description is diminished, by settlement, the difficulty of settling the residue is increased, from the consideration, that, in many instances, it can be obtained only by legal process. For more precise details on this subject, I refer to a report from the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

DECEMBER, 1823.

President's Annual Message.

SENATE.

The sum which was appropriated at the last session, for the repair of the Cumberland road, has been applied with good effect to that object. A final report has not been received from the agent who was appointed to superintend it. As soon as it is received, it shall be communicated to Congress.

Many patriotic and enlightened citizens, who have made the subject an object of particular investigation, have suggested an improvement of still greater importance. They are of opinion that the waters of the Chesapeake and Ohio may be connected together, by one continued canal, and at an expense far short of the value and importance of the object to be obtained. If this could be accomplished, it is impossible to calculate the beneficial consequences which would result from it. A great portion of the produce of the very fertile country through which it will pass, would find a market through that channel. Troops might be moved with great facility in war, with cannon, and every kind of munition, and in either direction. Connecting the Atlantic with the Western country, in a line passing through the Seat of the National Government, it would contribute essentially to strengthen the bond of union itself. Believing, as I do, that Congress have the right to appropriate money for such a national object, (the jurisdiction remaining to the States through which the canal would pass,) I submit it to your consideration whether it may not be advisable to authorize, by an adequate appropriation, the employment of a suitable number of the officers of the corps of engineers, to examine the unexplored ground, during the next season, and to report their opinion thereon. It will likewise be proper to extend their examination to the several routes through which the waters of the Ohio may be connected, by canals, with those of Lake Erie.

As the Cumberland road will require annual repairs, and Congress have not thought it expedient to recommend to the States an amendment to the Constitution, for the purpose of vesting in the United States a power to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement, it is also submitted to your consideration, whether it may not be expedient to authorize the Executive to enter into an arrangement with the several States through which the road passes, to establish tolls, each within its limits, for the purpose of defraying the expense of future repairs, and of providing, also, by suitable penalties, for its protection against future injuries.

The act of Congress of the seventh of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, appropriated the sum of twenty-two thousand seven hundred dollars for the purpose of erecting two piers as a shelter for vessels from ice, near Cape Henlopen, Delaware Bay. To effect the object of the act, the officers of the Board of Engineers, with Commodore Bainbridge, were directed to prepare plans and estimates of piers sufficient to answer the purpose intended by the act. It appears by their report, which accompanies the documents from the War Department, that the appropriation is not adequate to the purpose intended; and, as the piers would be of great service, both to the navigation of the Delaware Bay, and the protection of vessels on the adjacent parts of the coast, I submit to the consideration of Congress whether additional and sufficient appropriation should not be made.

The Board of Engineers were also directed to examine and survey the entrance of the harbor of the port of Presque Isle, in Pennsylvania, in order to make an estimate of the expense of removing the obstructions to the entrance, with a plan of the best mode of effecting the same, under the appropriation for that purpose, by act of Congress, passed the 3d of March last. The report of the board accompanies the papers from the War Department, and is submitted for the consideration of Congress.

A strong hope has been long entertained, founded on the heroic struggle of the Greeks, that they would succeed in their contest, and resume their equal station among the nations of the earth. It is believed that the whole civilized world takes a deep interest in their welfare. Although no Power has declared in their favor, yet none, according to our information, has taken part against them. Their cause and their name have protected them from dangers, which might, ere this, have overwhelmed any other people. The ordinary calculations of interest, and of acquisition, with a view to aggrandizement, which mingle so much in the transactions of nations, seem to have had no effect in regard to them. From the facts which have come to our knowledge, there is good cause to believe that their enemy has lost forever all dominion over them; that Greece will become again an independent nation. That she may obtain that rank, is the object of our most ardent wishes.

It was stated at the commencement of the last session, that a great effort was then making in Spain and Portugal to improve the condition of the people of those countries, and that it appeared to be conducted with extraordinary moderation. It need scarcely be remarked, that the result has been, so far, very different from what was then anticipated. Of events in that quarter of the globe, with which we have so much intercourse, and from which we derive our origin, we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly, in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow-men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European Powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded, or seriously menaced, that we resent injuries, or make preparation for our defence. With the movements in this hemisphere, we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied Powers is essentially different, in this respect, from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defence of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare, that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power, we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But, with the Governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration, and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling, in any other manner, their destiny, by any European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. In the war between those new Governments and Spain, we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered, and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur, which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change, on the part of the United States, indispensable to their security.

The late events in Spain and Portugal, show that Europe is still unsettled. Of this important fact, no stronger proof can be adduced than that the allied Powers should have thought it proper, on any principle satisfactory to themselves, to have interposed, by force, in the internal concerns of Spain. To what extent such interposition may be carried, on the same principle, is a question, in which all independent Powers, whose Governments differ from theirs, are interested; even those most remote, and surely none more so than the United States. Our policy, in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its Powers; to consider the Government de facto as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy; meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every Power; submitting to injuries from none. But, in regard to those continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent, without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can any one believe that our Southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference. If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new Governments, and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that she can never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves, in the hope that other Powers will pursue the same course.

If we compare the present condition of our Union with its actual state at the close of our Revolution, the history of the world furnishes no example of a progress, in improvement in all the important circumstances which constitute the happiness of a nation, which bears any resemblance to it. At the first epoch, our population did not exceed three millions. By the last census, it amounted to about ten millions, and, what is more extraordinary, it is almost altogether native; for the emigration from other countries has been inconsiderable. At the first epoch, half the territory within our acknowledged limits was uninhabited and a wilderness. Since then, new territory has been acquired, of vast extent, comprising within it many rivers, particularly the Mississippi, the navigation of which to the ocean was of the highest importance to the original States. Over this territory our population has expanded in every direction, and new States have been established, almost equal in number to those which formed the first bond of our Union. This expansion of our population, and accession of new States to our Union, have had the happiest effect on all its highest interests. That it has eminently augmented our resources, and added to our strength and respectability as a Power, is admitted by all. But it is not in these important circumstances only that this happy effect is felt. It is manifest that, by enlarging the basis of our system and increasing the number of States, the system itself has been greatly strengthened in both its branches. Consolidation and disunion have thereby been rendered equally impracticable. Each Government, confiding in its own strength, has less to apprehend from the other; and, in consequence, each enjoying a greater freedom of action, is rendered more efficient for all the purposes for which it was instituted. It is unnecessary to treat, here, of the vast improvement made in the system itself, by the adoption of this Constitution, and of its happy effect in elevating the character, and in protecting the rights of the nation, as well as of individuals. To what then do we owe these blessings? It is known to all that we derive them from the excellence of our institutions. Ought we not then to adopt every measure which may be necessary to perpetuate them?

MONDAY, December 8.

RICHARD M. JOHNSON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March last, stated, that he had neglected bringing his credentials with him, expecting they would be forwarded by the proper authority of the State, and which he still supposed would speedily be done: Whereupon, the oath prescribed by law was administered to him, and he took his seat in the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted the third instant, for the appointment of the Standing Committees; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The resolution offered by Mr. EATON, on Friday last, was taken up for consideration. It provided for the choice, by ballot, of five members, to act as chairmen of the five most important committees, with power to fill up their own, and select the members of the remaining committees. Mr. BARBOUR proposed to amend Mr. EATON's resolution, so as to give the power of appointing committees to the presiding officer of the Senate. This amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading.

[The Rule of the Senate has, heretofore, been to elect its Standing Committees, at the commencement of each session, by ballot. Inconveniences have been found to attend this mode of election; and it is now proposed that the Senate adopt the practice of the House of Representatives, and give the selection of its Standing Committees to the presiding officer.]

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

By the act of the last session of Congress, it was made the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of the State of New York, on principles of equity and justice, subject to the revision and final decision of the President of the United States. The accounting officers have, in compliance with this act, reported to me a balance of $35,190, in favor of Governor Tompkins, which report I have had under consideration, together with his claim to an additional allowance, and should have decided on the same before the present time, had I not delayed my decision at his request. From the view which I have taken of the subject, I am satisfied, considering all the circumstances of the case, that a larger sum ought to be allowed him than that reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury. No appropriation, however, having been made by the act, and it appearing, by recent information from him, that the sum reported would afford him an essential accommodation at this time, the subject is submitted to the consideration of Congress, with a view to that object.

JAMES MONROE.

WEDNESDAY, December 10.

A letter was received from the Hon. James Brown, (recently appointed Minister to France,) resigning his seat in the Senate; and, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the President of the Senate was requested to give notice of this resignation to the Executive of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. BARBOUR stated that sundry claims, for advances during the late war, had existed in favor of the State of Virginia, against the General Government, the principal part of which had been allowed by the department to which belonged the adjustment of such claims; but, as there were still several items of the account which the accounting officers did not think it within their province to allow, he had been instructed to endeavor to obtain the passage of an act of Congress in relation to these claims. He, therefore, submitted the following resolution, which was read and laid over for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law, authorizing the proper department to settle, on equitable terms the claims of Virginia against the Government of the United States, arising from advances made by Virginia during the late war.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had made a fruitless attempt, at the last session, to obtain information through a committee, concerning the expediency of a new organization of the judiciary powers of the country—that the measure was then thought to be premature; but recent events had proved that it was not so. He thought it the duty of Congress to remedy the defect which he believed to exist in this department of the Government—that tremendous evils might result to the country, from the powers imparted to its judiciary; when a whole State, and a State that had always been loyal to the Government, might be convulsed to its very centre by a judicial decision. He did not mean these remarks as reflecting upon the conduct of the judges, for he believed them to be highly enlightened and intelligent. But whatever degree of talent or integrity might be possessed by the judges, Mr. J. said he considered, in this case, only the tenure of their offices, and their responsibility. Some remedy for the defect to which he had alluded, he believed must ere long be adopted, to preserve the purity of our political institutions. Mr. J. then offered the following resolution, which was read, and laid over for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of forming and constituting three additional judicial circuits, to be added to the present number, with an additional judge to each, viz: one to be composed of the States of Tennessee and Alabama; one of Mississippi and Louisiana, and one of Illinois and Missouri—also, to inquire into the expediency of amending the law respecting the Judiciary of the United States, so as to require a concurrence of at least seven judges in any opinion, which may involve the validity of the laws of the United States, or of the States respectively.

Mr. DICKERSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed, who, with a committee to be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, shall make such distribution of the rooms of the centre building of the Capitol, as the business and convenience of the two Houses of Congress may require.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the petition of William Hill, stating that, being confined in the jail of Allegany county, by virtue of a process from the District Court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, he has applied for the benefit of the act of Congress, of January 6th, 1800; but that, owing to the absence of the judge, who has been advised to remove to a warmer climate, as the only means of preserving his life, he cannot avail himself of the provisions of said act; and praying relief. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the petition of Jonathan H. Lambdin, stating that, owing to the absence of the Judge of the District Court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, he is prevented from availing himself of the provisions of the act of January 6th 1800, for the benefit of debtors confined in jail; and praying relief.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the petition of Abraham V. Matson, stating that, owing to the absence of the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, he cannot avail himself of the provisions of the act of January 6th, 1800, and must remain in close confinement until the return of the judge, or the appointment of his successor; and praying relief. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DICKERSON presented the petition of Frederick W. Smith, a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, stating that, whilst employed on board the sloop of war Ontario, he lost overboard, in a gale of wind, a pocket-book, containing money and vouchers to the amount of eight hundred dollars; that he has been thereby prevented from adjusting his accounts at the proper department; and praying the passage of an act for his relief. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of Henry Gray and William Gray, of Boston, representing that they have sustained great loss by the illegal condemnation of their vessel and cargo, at Porto Rico; that, in the capture of the same, their private rights have been invaded, and the flag and authority of the United States contemned; and praying the adoption of such measures as may secure the rights of the citizen, and tend to the safety of the future commerce of the country. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BARTON presented the petition of Eleanor Tansy, stating that her son, a private in the corps of Missouri Rangers, during the late war, received a wound, of which he died, leaving the petitioner unable, from age and infirmity, to procure a subsistence by her own exertions; and praying a pension. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the ninth instant, for the appointment of a Committee on Roads and Canals, which was amended, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee, of five members, be appointed on Roads and Canals, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Messrs. BROWN, EDWARDS, of Illinois, PALMER, SMITH, and McILVAINE, were appointed the said committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the ninth instant, for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing imprisonment for debt, and agreed thereto; and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, BARTON, VAN BUREN, HOLMES, of Maine, and BELL, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. BENTON gave notice, that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to introduce a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as concerns our relations with foreign Powers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion, of Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, so much of the President's Message as relates to the Navy of the United States, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion, by Mr. DICKERSON, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to commerce, and to the encouragement which ought to be given to manufactures, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAINS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing the Senate of the concurrence of the House in the resolutions from the Senate, for a joint committee on enrolled bills, and for the appointment of two Chaplains of different denominations; and that the House had made choice, on their part, of the Rev. HENRY B. BASCOM, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as their Chaplain.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, the Senate then proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part. On the first ballot, no choice was made, the votes being as follows:

Whole number 38; necessary to a choice 20.
Rev. Dr. Staughton	-	-	-	17
Rev. Mr. McIlvaine	-	-	-	9
Rev. Mr. Post	-	-	-	8

Rev. Dr. Staughton	-	-	-	22
Rev. Mr. McIlvaine	-	-	-	8
Rev. Mr. Post	-	-	-	7
Rev. Mr. Allen	-	-	-	2

And the Rev. Dr. STAUGHTON was declared to be elected Chaplain of the Senate, for the present session.

Mr. BARTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of making further provisions by law for the final decision of incomplete titles to lands held under the authority of France or Spain, in the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas.

by virtue of warrants issued under the act of Congress, of the 17th of February, 1815, entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, who suffered by earthquakes."

Mr. EATON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the settlement, on principles of equity, of the accounts of the late Robert Seacy, Paymaster for West Tennessee, in the years 1816, 1817, and 1818; and of extending to him such other and further relief as to said Committee he may seem to be entitled.

Mr. BARTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of Samuel Gilbert, of the State of Missouri, for property taken from him, by the Sac Indians, in 1815, after they had notice of the treaty of peace with Great Britain, but before the treaty of peace was concluded with those Indians, in 1816, by the second article of which, they were bound to restore that property; but were afterwards released, by the United States, from that obligation.

Mr. HAYNE gave notice that, on Monday next, he should ask leave to introduce a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to secure the election of President and Vice President of the United States by the Electors, and to prevent those elections from devolving, in any event, on the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of J. L. Skinner, stating that he became interested in a contract, entered into by the Government with one George Paul, for the construction of a part of the Cumberland Road, at a stipulated price per mile; that, soon after the commencement of the work, the mode of constructing it was materially varied by the Superintendent, by which he has been subjected to great additional expense; for which, and other departures from the contract, he prays compensation. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. FINDLAY presented the memorial of Joseph S. McPherson, a Master Commandant in the Navy of the United States, representing that, owing to the loss of his portable writing desk, containing his vouchers for the expenditure of the public moneys placed in his hands, stolen by a certain Thomas Wingate, and for which the said Wingate has been tried and found guilty, he has been prevented from settling his accounts, and praying the passage of an act for his relief. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. VAN BUREN presented the petition of Archibald Gracie, of New York, stating that property belonging to the petitioner was seized by the French, at Hamburg, in the year 1807; that the capture was without ground, and that the property, without any trial, or civil process whatever, was appropriated to the purposes of the French Government; that the claim is one of a nature the most manifest, and praying the assistance of the Government to obtain its allowance; which petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, so much of the Message of the President of the United States, of the 2d instant, as relates to the revenue and finances of the United States, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. CHANDLER, so much of the Message of the President of the United States, of the 2d instant, as relates to the militia, was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of establishing three new judicial districts; and of requiring the united opinion of seven judges, on any question involving the validity of a law of the United States, or of the States, respectively, was again read.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the resolution was so amended as to require that, in the cases contemplated in the latter part of this resolution, the opinions of the judges should be given separately, and recorded. The resolution was then, on motion of Mr. EATON, ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, submitted yesterday, for the appointment of a joint committee to distribute the rooms in the centre building of the Capitol, and agreed thereto; and Messrs. DICKERSON, D'WOLF, and LLOYD, of Maryland, were appointed the said committee.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

In pursuance of notice given yesterday, Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to introduce the following resolution, which passed to a second reading, and was ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the whole number of States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution:

That, for the purpose of electing a President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall be divided, by the Legislature thereof, into a number of districts equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress; each district shall be composed of contiguous territory, and shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled, by the Constitution, to be represented, and on such days as Congress shall determine, which days shall be the same throughout the United States, the citizens of each State, who may be qualified to vote for a Representative in Congress, shall meet at such places within their respective districts as the Legislature of each State shall appoint; and each, in his proper person, shall vote for President and Vice President, one of whom, at the least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with himself; and separate triplicate lists shall be kept of all the voters, and of all the votes given for each person as President, and for each as Vice President. All the votes, so given in each district, shall be collected forthwith, in such manner as the Legislature of the State may direct, at some one convenient place within the district; and the votes given for each candidate shall be added together, and the person having the greatest number of votes for President, and the one having the greatest number of votes for Vice President, shall be certified as duly preferred in said district, and shall be entitled to one vote each for the respective offices for which they are candidates; but, if two or more persons shall have an equal number of votes in such district election, for the same office, then the returning officers shall decide between them, and certify accordingly. Triplicate certificates of the whole number of votes given for each candidate shall be made out, and transmitted, in such manner as Congress may direct, to the Seat of Government of the United States, addressed to the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of electoral votes within the United States; and if no person have such majority, then the President shall be chosen by the House of Representatives, from the three having the greatest number of votes for President, in the manner now prescribed by the Constitution.

The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President shall be the Vice President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of electoral districts, and if no person have such majority, then the Vice President shall be chosen by the Senate, from the two persons having the greatest number of votes for that office, in the manner now prescribed by the Constitution.

CLAIMS OF VIRGINIA.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. BARBOUR, instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the propriety of allowing certain claims of the State of Virginia for moneys advanced on account of the General Government, during the late war, was again read for consideration. A letter from the Governor of Virginia, in relation to the claim, was also read.

Mr. SMITH understood the resolution to have reference, more particularly, to a claim for interest on moneys advanced during the war, by the State of Virginia. He said he should have no objection to the resolution, provided it were made a general one, to reach all claims of a like nature. The State of Maryland, and many corporations and individuals, hold claims of a similar kind, and the principle upon which this motion was predicated, Mr. S. thought, should extend to them all.

Mr. BARBOUR said the case of the State of Virginia, concerning which the resolution proposed an inquiry, was one of a peculiar nature. Although it was a general principle of the Government not to allow interest on claims for services during the war, yet this case he thought different from most others. Although the Government of the United States had been repeatedly called upon to furnish the money expended in the State of Virginia, yet such was the state of the public Treasury at that time, that the means were not provided. The State was compelled to depend entirely upon her own resources; the taxes upon the people were very oppressive, but they were cheerfully borne. These taxes were not sufficient to meet the necessary expenditures. The State was compelled to borrow money, and to pay interest for it; this was done for the benefit of the Government, and the interest thus paid, certainly ought to be reimbursed. There could be no doubt that Government was bound, in time of war, to make advances of the funds required for the defence of the country; if the Government was not able to make such advances, and they were made by the State in which such advances became necessary, common justice requires that, when the Government becomes able, not only the principal, but the interest also, should be reimbursed. He had now presented this case, as he had been instructed, on the part of the State of Virginia, and did not see the propriety of a copartnership with any other claim, whether of a similar nature or not. He wished his own claim decided on its own merits; other cases, when brought forward, might be referred to the same committee, and, if alike in their nature, a general bill might be made to meet them all; but Mr. B. said he did not now wish to associate his claim with any other; he hoped, therefore, that his case would be presented to the committee by itself.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, said he did not understand the distinction between the claims of the State of Virginia, and many others which exist. He presumed they were for interest on moneys advanced for the service of the country; the State of Maryland had claims of precisely the same nature; she had advanced moneys which were expended for arms, equipments, and compensation for militia services. He considered this the same ground; when acting on a general principle, the same provision should be extended to all cases that come within its limits. Mr. L. had no hostility to the claim of Virginia, but thought the case of Maryland was equally as strong, and hoped the resolution would be so modified as to meet all cases of a similar nature.

Mr. BARBOUR said he did not mean to question the claim of the State of Maryland, but he did not wish it to be associated with that which he had presented at this time; his was an insulated proposition, and not affecting any other. If Maryland was entitled to similar relief, let the gentleman from that State present the subject entire, and he should not object to it. It was not interest alone, Mr. B. said, that constituted the items of the claim of Virginia; but the resolution contemplated to give power to the proper department to settle, upon equitable principles, the whole claim. We were, at that time, unacquainted with the forms necessary to be observed in a state of war; and, although bona fide expenditures of the money had been made, yet the proper documents could not always be produced; in many instances the technicality required at the offices could not be complied with—although the claim might be allowed to be just, yet, in many cases, the vouchers are wanting. He therefore hoped the resolution would pass.

Mr. SMITH made some further remarks, and concluded by moving that the resolution be ordered to lie on the table, which was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

In pursuance of a notice given on Friday last, Mr. HAYNE rose to ask leave to offer a resolution to propose to the Legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to provide for the election of President and Vice President by the Electors, and to prevent the election from devolving, in any event, upon the House of Representatives. Mr. H. said that, in introducing this resolution, he would ask the indulgence of the Senate while he should briefly state his views on the subject. The number of amendments which had already been proposed, and others which are contemplated, call the attention of Congress strongly towards this important point. He did not deny that visionary schemes, proposing alterations in our systems of government, were but too common—he was opposed, in habit and principle, to rash innovations. But, though it certainly is not proper to change the Constitution for light and frivolous causes, yet the necessity certainly may exist to authorize such changes as will tend to the future security of the country. The necessity of some change, at present, is too obvious to be disregarded. It is the duty of nations, as well as of individuals, by foresight, to guard against impending evils. What rational being would not provide against an approaching tempest that was threatening to destroy him? And what nation, when its enemy was at the door, would not provide for defence against him? When the storm is impending it is time to close the avenues against it. If we fold our arms, and wait until the evils come upon us, it will then be too late to provide the remedy—we may then, in the spirit of the Roman Senate, wrap ourselves in our robes, and submit to our fate. But we shall be subject to reproach for not having exerted ourselves to avert the causes of those evils. It is worthy of the deepest reflection, that this period is a safe one to institute such improvement as is deemed necessary. The moment of actual suffering is certainly not the most propitious for change; nor, when there is a perfect calm in the political concerns of the country. But, when the dreaded evils are clearly foreseen, and are yet at a distance; when no prejudices are yet aroused to prevent deliberate judgment on the subject—then is the time to provide against them. That propitious moment is the present. The public mind is awake to the subject, and the favorable period may not again come. That some amendment is necessary—some provision against this defect in the Constitution—is admitted on all hands. Even his venerable friend, Mr. H. said, who had stood here for thirty years to defend the integrity of the Constitution, (alluding probably to Mr. Macon,) yielded to the conviction that some alteration was necessary in this part of that instrument. Two classes of amendment had been suggested—the one, relating to the mode of choosing the Electors, and the other, to the mode of choice by the Electors. So many different propositions had been offered in regard to the manner of choosing Electors, that it had been thought proper to waive that subject. But, certainly, Mr. H. thought it infinitely more important that some provision should be made to secure the election, actually and in spirit, by the Electors. In all the modes by which the Electors are chosen, they represent the true feelings and views of the people. But this truly popular mode of election may fail, because the choice does not happen to be made at the first balloting. The election ought not to come to the House of Representatives or the Senate; for they are but the representatives of the States in such an election, and it may happen that a small minority may give a President to the nation. By such a course the country might be involved in great difficulty. The remedy appeared so obvious, and so immediately upon the surface of the subject, Mr. H. was surprised that it had not yet been suggested—it is only to apply the same rule to this that is applied to all other elections. On the failure of the first balloting to produce a choice, proceed to the second, and continue until the election is effected. Mr. H. said his resolution proposed that the Electors should not be discharged until they had fulfilled their commission; that, after the first balloting, if the choice was not made, they should be again convened, by proclamation of the President, in their respective States, or at the Seat of Government. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the country is rapidly increasing, and that the probability of effecting an election at the first balloting of the Electors will continue to diminish. In the State elections, there is often a failure to elect their officers at the first balloting; but the power is not then transferred to other hands. The consequences which this amendment provides against must happen, if something is not done to prevent them. If it is adopted, the President will then be, emphatically, the man of the people's choice; the door will then be shut against fraud and corruption, and all improper combinations will be prevented. Should Congress agree to the resolution, and the people adopt the amendment, it would not be too late for its application to the ensuing election. In seventeen of the States, the Legislatures will be in session in time to act upon it; and, in the others, the sessions may be anticipated for a few weeks for the purpose. But the merits of his proposition, Mr. H. observed, did not depend upon its effect on the ensuing election—it was intended for the future benefit of our country, whose liberties, he trusted, were founded on a basis so solid as to resist all encroachments, but those of time itself.

Leave was then granted to Mr. HAYNE to introduce the following resolution; which was read, passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed:

After the resolution of Mr. HAYNE was read, Mr. MACON moved that all the resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, as well those offered at the last session as at the present, should be printed in a pamphlet; in order that the Senate might have one view of the whole. Mr. DICKERSON then gave notice that he should, to-morrow, call up the proposition to amend the Constitution, which he proposed the last session. Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, gave similar notice in regard to a resolution which he had offered; and Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, in relation to an amendment, which he said was proposed by the honored and venerable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAYLOR,) who had not taken his seat the present session. The motion for printing, proposed by Mr. MACON, was therefore postponed until to-morrow.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution:

"That, for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled. The districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled, by the Constitution, to be represented, or of persons qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. In each district the persons qualified to vote shall choose one Representative.

"That, for the purpose of choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, the persons qualified to vote for Representatives, in each district, shall choose one Elector; and, at the same time, the two additional Electors to which each State is entitled, shall be chosen by the persons so qualified to vote, in such manner as the Legislature of the State shall direct. The Electors, when convened at the time and place prescribed by law, for the purpose of voting for President and Vice President of the United States, shall have power, in case any of them shall fail to attend, to choose an Elector or Electors, in place of him or them so failing to attend. The division of States into districts, as hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted, and immediately after every future census and apportionment of Representatives, under the same; and such districts shall not be altered until a subsequent census shall have been taken, and an apportionment of Representatives under it shall have been made.

"That, when the lists of all persons voted for as President and Vice President, and the number of votes for each, shall have been transmitted to the seat of Government, as required by the Constitution, the Senate and House of Representatives shall form a joint meeting, in which the President of the Senate shall preside, who shall then open all the certificates, and the votes shall be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such a majority, then, from the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the joint meeting shall, immediately, by ballot, choose the President. A majority of the votes of all the members present shall be necessary to a choice on the first ballot; after which, a plurality of votes only shall be necessary to a choice. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; if no person have such a majority, then he shall be chosen by the Senate, as directed by the Constitution.

"That no person, who has been twice elected President of the United States, shall again be eligible to that office."

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the whole number of States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of said Constitution:

"Questions of the validity of the election of President, shall be determined by the Senators and Representatives, in joint ballot. The President of the Senate shall preside; and a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum. The rules of proceeding shall be determined by law; but no rules shall have effect until two years after they shall have been made."

But, if it shall happen that no person is duly elected President of the United States, either at the first or second meeting of the said Electors, then the Senate and House of Representatives shall immediately, by ballot, each member of both Houses giving one vote, proceed to elect a President from the persons duly voted for at the second meeting of the said Electors. A majority of all the members present at the said joint meeting of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be necessary to a choice of the President of the United States, on the first ballot; after which, a plurality of said votes shall decide the election. DUTIES ON IMPORTS AND TONNAGE.

The bill to revive and continue in force certain acts relative to duties on imports and tonnage, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Finance, rose to state to the Senate the objects of this bill. He said the subject was probably generally understood by members; but, as some might not have had the time to pay that attention to the subject which its importance required, he hoped to be pardoned for attempting to explain it. On the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, it was soon perceived that the navigation of the country was prostrated; and that our trade was carried on, almost exclusively, by foreign shipping. Under these circumstances, it became necessary that Congress should adopt some measure to give encouragement to our own shipping; and a law, proposing to give our commerce the necessary advantages over that of foreign nations, in our own ports, was passed. This law established a tonnage duty of six cents on the American vessel, and fifty cents on the foreign, and also an import duty of 10 per cent. in favor of the shipping of the United States. These two provisions, it was then believed, would operate so favorably as to induce American merchants to build vessels, and this expectation was abundantly realized. The commerce of the country made such rapid progress under the system, as to render it very little necessary. All the expected advantages were reaped from this law, so long as the principle remained untouched by foreign nations. But, their attention was finally turned towards it. England observed the great advantages that resulted from our discriminating duties; and, in a subsequent treaty with us, she reserved to herself the right to countervail these duties, which she afterwards did. At the time she instituted her countervailing duties, our then Minister in England wrote a letter to the Government, suggesting the propriety of taking some measures on the subject, before England had time to taste the sweets of this policy. About the year 1801, the subject was brought forward in Congress, and the necessity of doing away all countervailing duties, by admitting, on terms of reciprocity, the vessels of all nations who were willing to adopt the same policy in regard to us, was explained. But the attempt did not succeed; people could not be made to extend their views to the time when the European wars should cease, and the nations left free to retort upon us, for our discriminating system. But, at last, the peace of Amiens took place, and that event opened the eyes of our people. It showed us that British ships would get all the employment, while we retained our discriminating law. They could carry goods the whole amount of freight cheaper than our vessels. War again commenced; and, so long as it continued, our system did us no harm. But when peace again returned, it was soon found what would be the result of our policy. It was in 1815 that the act passed repealing all discriminating duties on the vessels of those nations which would admit ours on terms of reciprocity. Mr. S. enumerated subsequent laws which had passed, defining the operation of the act, in relation to our trade with the colonies of other countries, with the Hanse towns, &c. In the last act they had all been continued in operation till the 1st of January, 1824, and the law now before the Senate proposed still to continue them in force. The law which was passed, introducing the principle of reciprocity in regard to the Netherlands, was met by their Government with a corresponding spirit; but they have since made a law of a discriminating nature, from the supposition that we intended to give up the system of reciprocity. But, Mr. S. said, he had been informed by their chargé d'affaires that the revival of this act on our part would produce the repeal of their late law. The importance of acting immediately on this subject, in consequence of the proximity of the period when the former acts in relation to it would expire, Mr. S. said, had induced him to present the objects of the bill to the Senate at this time.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said he regretted extremely the necessity of acting with so much haste upon a subject of this importance. The acts proposed to be continued in force, he knew, provided for the admission of the commerce of foreign nations upon the same footing as they admit ours. But, the amendments which had been proposed to this act, by the committee to whom it was referred, Mr. L. had not seen until he found them on his table this morning. He did not know that they would go any further than had been stated by the honorable gentleman from Maryland. If they went no further than to continue in force the present acts of reciprocity, he would cheerfully vote for them; but, of one part of the proposed bill, he felt a little doubtful. Mr. L. read a clause of the bill, which he thought would require that the trade with the colonies of foreign nations should be placed on the same footing as the trade to the mother countries. This provision he was averse to, as the trade to the colonies had always been regulated by the Governments to which they belonged. The law of 1815, was a very just and proper law; that law only made it the duty of the Executive to ascertain upon what terms our commerce was admitted by other nations, and then to reciprocate those terms and abolish the discriminating system. The view which the gentleman from Maryland had taken was correct. It was true that, at the end of the Revolutionary war, our commerce was prostrated, or rather that it was non-existent. We had, with the utmost exertion, thrown off the trammels of the mother country; and we came out of that struggle in a state of exhaustion. In this state we were left to feel our own way—we were without experience. It was not wonderful, then, that our commerce was paralyzed—it could hardly be otherwise. Among other expedients to give it life, the system of discriminating duties was adopted. Our commerce began to flourish, and unrivalled success attended it. Very shortly after, indeed almost at the same moment, the French revolution took place, a revolution which convulsed the whole world. This event threw a very great proportion of trade immediately into our hands. Mr. L. thought this a greater cause of the prosperity of our commerce, than any discriminating duties laid by us. Afterwards it had been thought proper to renounce the discriminating system and to adopt a fair and broad principle of reciprocity. The expediency of this measure had been fully proved—there could be no doubt of it—experience had tested it. Into that system Great Britain had reluctantly entered. Notwithstanding the equal terms upon which her ships were admitted to our ports, not one in twenty of the vessels which arrive with foreign goods are foreign vessels. She would not have adopted it, unless she had gained corresponding advantages in her trade with us. Mr. L. said he would agree to the bill now proposed, if it only went so far as to continue the former acts of reciprocity; but he feared it went further; that it required not only the trade to the European, but to the colonial ports also, to accord with its principles. To this requisition neither Great Britain nor France would submit; and it would only have a tendency to bring upon us a vexatious war of discriminating duties.

Mr. SMITH briefly replied. He did not think the words of the bill would warrant the conclusion drawn by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KING, of New York, made some few remarks on the subject, which were not heard distinctly.

Mr. HAYNE returned his thanks to the gentleman from Maryland for his able remarks upon the commercial history of the country; but confessed that he felt unprepared to act on this subject at this moment. He had only seen the bill for the first time this morning. He moved, therefore, that the subject should be postponed until to-morrow; and, in the meantime, the honorable member from Massachusetts would have an opportunity to satisfy his doubts upon the tendency of the bill, and he himself would have time for further inquiry.

Mr. HAYNE's motion prevailed, and the further consideration of the subject was postponed till to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. MILLS, of Massachusetts, rose to ask leave, in pursuance of notice which he had given on Friday last, to introduce a joint resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in regard to the election of President and Vice President. Previously, however, to the question, on granting leave being put, Mr. M. said he would, by the indulgence of the Senate, state the substance of his proposition, and, very briefly, some of the reasons which had induced him to offer it. The Constitution should be approached with great caution. He deprecated too frequent attempts to amend it, as calculated to derange its nicely adjusted powers, and to lessen the respect and veneration which all should cherish for that instrument. It was the work of men's hands, and therefore not perfect; but still ought not to be subjected to all the varying changes which temporary inconvenience may suggest, nor should alterations be made as an expedient to effect a momentary and perhaps imaginary good. For several successive sessions of Congress, Mr. M. said, efforts had been made to procure amendments in relation to this subject, and at the present session, those efforts had been renewed with increased zeal, and multiplied beyond all former example. After the various propositions which have been submitted to the Senate, it would be almost impossible to present any project which should bear the stamp of novelty, or which had not before occurred to others. He had, therefore, not attempted it, nor had he relied upon his own wisdom or invention in the amendment he was about to propose; but had resorted to the united wisdom of that illustrious band of patriots and statesmen, who devised and framed the excellent form of Government, under which we have enjoyed so much prosperity and happiness; and which, by a wise and prudent administration of our rulers, and intelligence and integrity among the people, was calculated to continue and perpetuate those blessings. He wished then, to return to the good old ways of our political fathers, and to reinstate in the Constitution its original provision for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States. This, Mr. M. said, was the whole of his proposition. It had met the sanction of the enlightened assembly to which he had alluded, and the conventions of the several States; it had been tested by experience, and seemed better calculated in time to come to to effect a choice by the Electors appointed for that purpose, and above all, to secure for the second office in the Government those qualifications and endowments, which, in a good degree, fit him for the first. The illustrious body of men who framed our Constitution, had difficulties of no small magnitude to encounter; local prejudices were to be removed; conflicting interests to be reconciled; the jealousy of the small States assuaged, and the power and influence of the large States restrained, and it was only by mutual sacrifices for the common good, that a system of compromise and concession was at length effected. Among those difficulties, the organization of the Executive department, the powers with which it should be invested, the number of which it should be composed, and the manner which it should be appointed, were not the least formidable. Upon this subject, they moved in a new and untried path, and were to be guided only by the light of their own minds, and a knowledge of the institutions of their country. The history of other republics, ancient or modern, afforded them no aid; for, although confederacies of free States had existed in different ages of the world, both in ancient and modern times, yet, in none of them had there existed a common permanent head, vested with Executive powers only, for the administration of the civil as well as military part of the Government, and appointed in any manner adapted to the genius of our people. This part of their duty, therefore, had called forth the most minute investigation and full discussion in that body. A recurrence to the history of those times, and to the journals of that Convention, would show that the plan adopted was not the only one submitted to their consideration; that various projects were offered, both in relation to the organization and duration of the office; that, at one time, it was proposed he should be elected by the Governors of the States, and that, for a long time after the first draught of the Constitution was submitted, it seemed to be determined that the Executive should be chosen by the Legislative branch of the Government; and this plan remained unaltered until about the time the Constitution was reported in its final shape. Until near this time, too, it was undecided by what number of individuals the Executive power should be exercised—whether by one or more; whether such an office as that of Vice President should be created, or what should be his duties. From the various projects which were before them, and surrounded as they were with such numerous difficulties, the authors of the Constitution devised a plan for the election of President and Vice President, which secured the hearty concurrence of the people. For, although almost every other part of that instrument met with the warmest opposition, and particularly the powers vested in the Executive, yet it is believed that his mode of appointment escaped even the animadversion of its enemies.

For what purpose, asked Mr. M., was the office of Vice President created? Was it that he might preside over the meetings of this House? No sir. If that had been the case, we should be left, like most other legislative bodies, to appoint our own presiding officer. The Constitution had in view that he might be called upon, in certain events, to exercise the high and important functions of the chief Executive Magistrate. Hence, it provided that he should be voted for as President of the United States, from among the candidates for that high office. This mode of election clearly shows that his business in the Government, and the chief reason of his appointment, was not merely to conduct the deliberations of the Senate. The first officer in the Government might be arrested in the midst of his career, by the arm of death; sickness might destroy his faculties; the visitation of Providence might prostrate in ruins his intellectual powers; he might be removed by impeachment, or voluntarily retire from his arduous duties. In either of these events, the Executive authority must be administered by some individual, and the mode of election pointed out by the Constitution, as it originally stood, would always secure to the country, in the second office of the Government, the services of an enlightened citizen, elected with a view to his qualifications for the first office, and presumed to be capable of discharging its high and important duties. If this was the object for which he was elected, Mr. M. contended, that, reasoning a priori, that object would be much more likely to be effected, and with greater facility and security, in the mode originally pointed out in the Constitution. To accomplish the end in view, the Convention had provided, that the Electors should meet in their respective States, and vote for two persons, one of whom, at least, should not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; that the person having a majority of the votes of the Electors should be the President, and the person having the next highest number of votes should be the Vice President; presuming, that, as both would be voted for, without designation, as President, both would be worthy of the office, and competent to perform its duties. Experience has sanctioned the correctness of this theory, and proved the conclusion of their reasoning to be well founded. So long as that provision remained a part of the Constitution, and two persons were voted for, without designation or distinction, the person filling the office of Vice President was, invariably, at a subsequent election, elevated to the Executive chair. But, since that provision has been altered, and the Electors have been called upon to designate, by their votes, a person for a secondary and inferior office, other views and other considerations, have influenced his selection—without the hope or expectation of any further advancement.

But, Mr. M. said, the propriety of the original mode of election was not only evident from the deductions of reasoning, and the voice of experience, but it was fully confirmed by the prospect of the future, and especially by the prospect immediately before the nation. An election is rapidly approaching; and, although a constellation of worthies have been for months, and, he might say, for years, presented to the people, as candidates for the Presidential chair, what single individual has yet been seriously named to fill the office of Vice President? While no small excitement exists in the public mind in relation to the one, there was, as far as he knew, an utter apathy and indifference in relation to the other. What, then, Mr. M. asked, would be the probable result of the two modes, at the approaching election? Suppose all these distinguished personages should be candidates, one only could be chosen to office; because, the friends of neither, under the present system, would probably consent that their favorite candidate for the Presidency should be held up, eo nomine, for the Vice Presidency. But, if the Constitution had remained in its original form, in all probability, two of them might be elected—one to the first, and another to the second office. You would then have a person for Vice President, capable, at least in the opinion of a plurality of the Electors, of discharging the duties incumbent on the President, and who had received their suffrages as such.

The leading object avowed by gentlemen who now propose amendments to the Constitution, is to prevent the election of President from devolving on the House of Representatives.

Mr. M. said that, if the view he had just presented was correct, the event, so much and so justly deprecated, would be much less likely to occur, under the Constitution as originally adopted, than in its present shape. In the various combinations of ballots which would result from voting for two persons for the same office, it would be almost certain that one of them would be elected President, and as the person having the next highest number, though not a majority, would be deemed to have a sufficient support to entitle him to the second office, as standing second in the confidence of the people, the election of both would be secured. Surely this would be a much better arrangement than that half a dozen candidates should be contending for the first office alone, neither of whom could have the second, and that, too, with very little prospect of either succeeding by the Electoral vote. Mr. M. put it to the Senate, whether this was not a fair view of the prospect immediately before us. Should the approaching election be conducted in the mode pointed out by the amendment which he was about to submit, very little doubt would be entertained that a choice would be effected, without the intervention of the House of Representatives. But, under the present mode, there was not, he said, probably, an honorable gentleman in the Senate who indulged a reasonable hope that this would be the result. To those, therefore, who wish to avoid so disastrous event, Mr. M. appealed for their support of the proposition he was about to submit, and to unite with him in restoring the Constitution to its original form.

Mr. M. said, that the object which he mainly had in view, was to reinstate in the Constitution the mode originally prescribed for the Electors to give in their votes. If this object should meet the countenance of the Senate, some of the amendments which have been proposed by other gentlemen, may, nevertheless, be engrafted upon it. He did not intend, nor perhaps would it be proper, to go into an argument respecting other propositions which had been offered, and which were now before the Senate. He begged leave, however, to submit a few remarks upon those parts of other plans which might be connected with or are hostile to his own proposition. The districting system, if approved, might be incorporated with the plan he was about to propose. But Mr. M. thought there were strong arguments against the amendment which proposed to district the whole country for the choice of Electors. One of its professed objects is, to secure the choice of Electors to the people, without any control of the States. If the election of the Federal Executive is to be made by the popular will, it is obvious that justice requires that the people in every part of the Union should be placed upon the basis of equality, so that the citizens of one State should enjoy as great a share of this privilege, as the citizens of another. Widely different, however, would be the operation of this system. Great inequality would be produced. The State of Rhode Island, for instance, with a population of a little over eighty thousand, is entitled to four Electors, and would, therefore, be divided into four districts, each district containing about twenty thousand; while the State of New York, entitled to thirty-six Electors, and divided into thirty-six Electoral districts, would have a population of forty thousand in each district. The argument, therefore, is fallacious and delusive, which holds this system as one of equality. There would, in fact, be as much inequality in this mode, as in an election by the House of Representatives; or, at least, a proportional inequality; for, it is obvious that a majority of the Electors might be chosen by a minority of the people.

So in regard to the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Missouri, (Mr. BEN-TON), giving the election of President and Vice President immediately to the people, by which each State is to be divided into districts, and each district to have one vote, and that vote to be decided by a majority of the people, in their primary assemblies. By this plan, too, a minority of the people may not only govern the votes of a State, but determine the election of a President. Mr.

M. said that, to illustrate the truth of this position, the more familiarly, he would again take the example of a small State. The State of Delaware would be divided into three districts, each district having one vote. Suppose that each of these districts should contain one thousand voters; that in one district they should be unanimous for A; that in the two other districts A should have four hundred and fifty votes, and B five hundred and fifty. Here, then, the people of the State of Delaware would cast nineteen hundred votes for A, and eleven hundred only for B; and yet, B would count two votes for President, in Delaware, and A only one. In addition to this objection, it would always be productive of great public excitement, if the election should be given immediately to the people, without the intervention of Electors. Experience has proved the truth of this remark. In those large States of the Union, where the Executive is elected by the people, and especially if his term is of more than one year's duration, there is much more public excitement, animosity, and bitterness produced, than in small States, where the office is of less importance.

The proposition of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) Mr. M. said, had many reasons to recommend it. But there was one provision in that amendment, to which he could not yield his assent. It provides that, when the choice is not effected by the Electors, at their first balloting in their respective States, the power of electing shall again return to them, all of whom, for this purpose, shall be convened in one place. Here would be the same opportunity for intrigue, cabal, and corruption, and the same inconveniences which attend an election by the House of Representatives. Mr. MILLS begged pardon of the Senate for any apparent transgression of Parliamentary rule, by even the slight consideration which he had given to the former propositions for amendment, which he had done only for reasons before stated. Believing, however, as he did, that the restoration of the Constitution to its original form, in regard to this important subject, would add to the stability of the Union, enhance the respectability of the Executive, by securing to the people the services of two of her most respected citizens in the two highest officers of the Government, and have a strong tendency to prevent the necessity of an election by the House of Representatives, he asked leave to introduce a joint resolution to that effect.

Leave was accordingly granted, and Mr. MILLS introduced the resolution as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of said Constitution:

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the Seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then, from the five highest on the list, the said House shall, in like manner, choose the President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the Electors, shall be the Vice President. But, if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them, by ballot, the Vice President.

Mr. VAN BUREN, of New York, rose and said, that pursuant to the notice he had heretofore given, he would now ask leave to introduce a resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States on the subject of the election of President and Vice President of the United States. Should the permission he asked be granted, it was his intention further to move that the resolution he offered be referred to the select committee already appointed on similar propositions. To enable that committee better to appreciate his views, as well as to explain the motives which had induced him to add to the number of propositions on the same subject already before them, he would, in the remarks he intended to make, refer to those propositions, and notice their respective contents. He would do this, not for the purpose of full discussion, but only so far as was necessary to mark the difference between them and the one he designed to offer, and for a brief explanation of the principles upon which that difference is founded. Before he proceeded to that object, he would add his humble testimony to the justice of the remark, that the extreme difficulty which is experienced in every attempt to improve the present Constitution, afforded the most striking evidence of the great wisdom and care which presided over the deliberation and governed the decision of those who made it. He would further add, that, although he felt much reluctance in originating a proposition of this character, he had not witnessed the frequent unsuccessful attempts at amendment which had been made with as much regret and dissatisfaction as was expressed by some. On the contrary, thinking as he did that as yet no improvident amendment of the original instrument had been made; and, believing, from the slow and scrutinizing process through which all amendments must pass, that there was little danger that any of equivocal character would obtain, he was induced to regard the frequent unsuccessful attempts to alter the present system as productive of much good, by strengthening and confirming the confidence of the people in the wisdom of its provision, and by increasing and perpetuating our gratitude for the services and respect for the memories of those illustrious men who formed it. That such had been their effect, he had no doubt.

There are, said Mr. VAN BUREN, already before the Senate, three distinct propositions on this subject, viz: One introduced by a Senator from Missouri; one by a Senator from New Jersey; and one by a Senator from North Carolina: to which, one had, that moment, been added, by a Senator from Massachusetts—the three first of which he would briefly notice. The last had, for its object, a course entirely different, as well from the one he intended to introduce, as those before it. The plan of the gentleman from Missouri proposes to divide the different States into districts, not for the choice of Electors of President and Vice President, but to take the votes of the people directly for those officers, allowing to each State as many votes as they are now entitled to, rendering a majority of all the votes necessary to a choice, and in the event of no election, on the first vote, by the people, the same to be made by the House of Representatives, each State having but one vote, as is now provided by the Constitution. The only remark he would now make, on that feature of the resolution which dispenses with the agency of intermediate Electors, was, that inasmuch as, with reference to the condition of the representation in particular States, secured to them by the Constitution, it does not profess to give the choice to a majority of the people, and, as it renders a resort to the House of Representatives almost indispensable, in the event of there being no choice in the first instance, he was not now prepared to give his assent to it. To judge of the propriety of so much of the different propositions as provide for a division of the several States into districts, a very brief inquiry into their operation and motive becomes both necessary and proper. It has been said, that that mode would effect the double purpose of bringing the election nearer to the people, by securing to them, in every State, the immediate choice of the Electors; and of protecting the right of the minorities in the different States. But when it is considered that, by the Constitution, each State has now the power of securing to its citizens those objects, when and as the people of those States represented in their State Legislatures may think proper to do it, he was disinclined to believe that a desire, on the part of any one State, to interfere in these respects with the internal condition of another, constituted the motive which induced them to urge the measure under consideration. The object which would be effected by it was of a different character. With regard to one effect, which it was calculated to produce on the different States, there was not, in the discussion on this floor last year, the least reserve, and, he presumed, there would not be any now. The alteration of the system, if adopted, can only be effected by consent of the parties to the present compact, and gentlemen, representing States differently situated, do but exercise a right, of which no one can complain, in proposing such terms as are most acceptable to, and will best subserve the interest of, their immediate constituents. It is well understood, that the tendency of this measure will be to reduce greatly the present weight of the large States in the general scale, by subjecting them to the full operation of the political divisions which are supposed to be more peculiar to them, and thereby preventing them from bringing their consolidated strength to bear upon the Presidential question. It is proposed to do this on the plan of the gentleman from Missouri, without concession of any description on the part of those States who would be benefited by the change. To decide whether the consent of the large States can, with reason, be expected to this change, it is proper to look for a moment to the present relative conditions of the States, on the score of influence, in the existing plan of Government. As he had not, as yet, heard any thing upon this subject, either now or at the last session, he would remark, that he made the reference he proposed under the full influence of those frank and liberal feelings which had characterized every thing that had hitherto been said or done on this subject. His design was to look at things as they were, without any other motive or feeling than a simple desire to ascertain, by a reference to facts, whether, if any alteration in the Constitution, in this particular, ought to be made, what that alteration should in justice be. It was to him a source of great satisfaction that a subject, so delicate in its character, had hitherto been commented upon in this House with so much freedom, and yet without the least asperity. It clearly showed, if proof of that could be necessary, that the objects of all were only such as, in their different views of the matter, ought, in justice, to be obtained.

The great departments of the Government were, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. The latter is organized by the two former, and the influence of the respective States, in its organization, is of course the same as it is in the other two. In the choice of the Executive, and in the popular branch of the Legislature, each State has a representation proportioned to its representative members, with this exception, that, in the choice of the Executive, an addition of two votes was given to each State, without regard to its numbers, or the amount of its contribution to the public Treasury. But in this branch of the Legislature the case is widely different. Here, in consequence of the peculiarity of our condition, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the equitable principle of representation, founded on population and contribution, has been entirely disregarded. Here, each State, on the score of its sovereign character, has equal weight; and what, he asked, was the relative importance of this branch in the Government? He would not say it was that by which all the efficient power of the Government was controlled, but he would say, that but a slight consideration of the Constitution was necessary to show that this branch did so more than any other. With the single exception of originating revenue bills, its legislative powers were coextensive with the popular branch. No law could pass without the assent of the Senate. Almost all the important proceedings of the Executive are subject to its revision. All appointments require its approbation, unless its assent is first obtained to a law providing a different mode. The consent of two thirds of this body is necessary to the validity of all treaties; and it has the sole power to try impeachments of all the high officers of the Government, as well executive as judicial. In a branch of the Government possessing such extensive powers, the small but patriotic State of Illinois, with a population of fifty-five thousand, has a representation equal to that of Pennsylvania, with a population of one million and fifty thousand. The five largest States in the Confederacy, viz: Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, and New York, with a population of four millions eight hundred thousand, have a representation but equal to the five smallest States, with a population of three hundred and fifty-three thousand. Nearly one half the nation, residing in the five largest States, has a representation but equal to the one twenty-seventh part, residing in the five smallest States. About one-half the whole people, residing in five States, are represented here by ten voices, whilst the other half are represented by thirty-four voices. The disproportion of the relative influence of the several States, having reference to their population, as a just basis of representation, cannot fail to strike every mind. The same inequality existed at the adoption of the Constitution, but in a much less degree. Then, taking an average of the population of the States, and considering those as small, who do not come up to it, the large States were in a majority; now, by the admission of new States, with assent of the old, they are in a minority. There were, at that period, eight large and five small States. Now, by the same criterion, there would be found to be but ten large, and fourteen small States. Still, this was all right; it was according to the compact into which all the States had voluntarily entered; and he fervently hoped, for the peace and happiness of the people of these States, that the day might be far distant, when even a desire should be entertained to alter it. But, when it is proposed so to change the Constitution, as to reduce still more the relative weight of the large States, in the general scale, it surely becomes proper to reflect on the existing condition of things. And in view of that, he asked, whether it was reasonable to expect the large States will ever assent to the proposition made by the gentleman from Missouri, reducing their political weight in the Confederacy, without concession of any kind, on the part of the other States? He thought not. Still, as one of the representatives of one of the large States he would give his assent to the measure proposed, of dividing the States into districts for the choice of Electors, provided it was done in the spirit which produced the Constitution, that is, a spirit of mutual concession. He was willing, for one, to make concessions for general harmony; and all he asked was, that they should be reciprocal; and those, he thought could, with care and justice, be made.

By the present Constitution, in the event of no one person having a majority, for the office of President, of the votes of the Electors, on the first ballot, the choice devolves on the House of Representatives; and, in such choice, each State has an equal vote. It is believed that, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the contingency on which this result was made to depend was not thought likely to happen. And it is supposed that from the great number of small States since admitted into the Confederacy, and from other causes, its occurrence for the future may be frequently expected. It is reasonable to suppose, that, inasmuch as it was evidently the leading design of the Constitution, that, in the choice of President and Vice President, the States should be represented, with the exception already noticed, according to their relative numbers, and, as they deem it but just, that such would be the case, this feature in the Constitution is, by the large States, considered inequitable. But, what is of greater importance, the provision bringing the election to the House of Representatives is deemed objectionable by all the States, on the ground that it jeopardizes the purity of the election, and exposes the whole system to danger, by affording facilities to the corruption of a part. If this wide-spread apprehension is well founded, and how far was so, was a point he would not at this moment discuss, it surely was one which addressed itself alike to all the States, whether great or small, and certainly not with the least force to the latter. All then that he asked, as a concession for harmony and the general good, was, that if the States were districted, the ultimate choice of President should be placed elsewhere, and decided upon more equitable principles. If that was conceded, and from the temper manifested by the Senate last year, he had every reason to hope it would, the next question would be, as to the least objectionable mode. He was not favorably inclined to that proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, because, although it provides for the ultimate choice, so far as it respects the relative weights of the States upon just principles, it does not effect what he considered at least an equal if not a greater object, the removal of the decision from the House of Representatives. Such as it was, however, coming from the Senator of a small State, it marked the just and liberal views which governed his conduct. He would prefer a different mode from that proposed by the Senator from South Carolina; for, although that contained much that was desirable, both in its principle, and as it respects the weight of the respective States in the decision, and as removing it at all events from the House of Representatives, still he feared that the project of sending the question back, under the same circumstances, to the Electors, from time to time, until they made a choice, would be found in practice extremely difficult, if not very dangerous. He would not now remark on the circumstance, that this proposition did not provide for districting the States, without which he did not hope that the small States would consent. He presumed that it was intended by the honorable mover to connect it with some proposition for that purpose, as he had, in the Senate, expressed his entire willingness to do. Under such views of the subject, he would ask leave to introduce a proposition essentially different from those on their table: one which, if not entirely just, was, he thought, liable to the fewest objections. In doing so, it was proper that he should state, and he was quite certain that he would thereby secure for the proposition a degree of consideration which it might not otherwise obtain, that the plan he offered was the same in principle with that heretofore proposed by a venerable Senator from Virginia, who was now, to Mr. V. B.'s great regret, and the public misfortune, prevented from attending. He said the principle was the same; his own humble effort had been solely directed to the object of rendering it more simple in its form and operation. How far he had succeeded in that, the Senate would judge, when the subject came under their particular consideration.

Having said this much upon that branch of the subject, Mr. V. B. would proceed to state briefly another point in which the proposition he offered differed essentially from the others proposed, and in which difference was involved a principle in the Government, as important, in his view, as any which had for some time been discussed on that floor. In doing so, it was a subject of gratification to him, that this principle had no reference to the relative and conflicting interest of the States in the Confederacy, but looked equally to the welfare and security of all. To a correct understanding of the point, he wished to present, it became necessary to take a brief view of the principle upon, and the circumstance under which, our present form of Government was established. Under the Articles of Confederation, the representation of each State in the General Government was equal. The Union was in all respects purely Federal, a league of sovereign States upon equal terms. To remedy certain defects, by supplying certain powers, the Convention which framed the present Constitution was called. That Convention, it is now well known, was immediately divided into parties, on the interesting question of the extent of power to be given to the new governments: whether it should be Federal or National; whether dependent upon or independent of the State governments. It is equally well known that that point, after having several times arrested the proceedings of the Convention, and threatened a dissolution of the Confederation, subsequently divided the people of the States on the question of ratification. He might add, that with the superadded question of what powers have been given by the Constitution to the General Government, to the agitation of which the feelings which sprung out in the Convention greatly contributed, it had continued to divide the people of this country down to the present period. The party in the Convention in favor of a more energetic Government, being unable to carry, or, if able, unwilling to hazard the success of the plan with the States, a middle course was agreed upon. That was, that the Government should be neither Federal nor National, but a mixture of both. That of the Legislative Department, one branch, the power of representation, should be wholly National, and the other, the Senate, wholly Federal. That, in the choice of the Executive, both interests should be regarded, and that the Judicial should be organized by the other two. But, to quiet effectually the apprehensions of the advocates for the rights and interest of the States, it was provided that the General Government should be made entirely dependent for its continuance, on the will and pleasure of the State governments. Hence, it was decided that the House of Representatives should be apportioned among the States, with reference to their population, and chosen by the people; and power was given to Congress to regulate and secure their choice, independent of, and beyond the control of the State governments. That the Senate should be chosen exclusively by the State Legislatures, and that the choice of the Electors of President and Vice President, although the principle of their apportionment was established by the Constitution, should, in all respects, except the time of their appointment and of their meeting, be under the exclusive control of the Legislatures of the several States. The scheme of Government thus formed, was submitted to the people of the respective States, through their Legislatures, for ratification. For a season its ratification was warmly opposed in almost every State. Although the control over the choice of but one branch of one department of the Government was vested in Congress, danger to the rights of the States was everywhere apprehended, and the question of the ratification of the Constitution rendered extremely doubtful.

To stem this torrent of opposition, the most distinguished commentators on the proposed plan (the authors of the Federalist) placed strongly and truly before the people of the States, the fact of the dependence of the General upon the State Governments, and the Constitutional right of those Governments, or even a majority of them, if the power they had conferred should be abused, to discontinue the new Government by withholding its Senate and Chief Magistrate. Among other things they said—

“The State Governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government, while the latter is no wise essential to the operation or organization of the power. Without the intervention of the State Legislatures, the President of the United States cannot be elected at all. They must in all cases have a great share in his appointment, and will perhaps, in most cases, themselves determine it. The Senate will be elected absolutely and exclusively by the State Legislatures. Even the House of Representatives, though drawn immediately from the people, will be chosen very much under the influence of that class of men whose influence over the people obtains for themselves an election into the State Legislatures. Thus each of the principal branches of the Federal Government will owe its existence, more or less, to the favor of State Governments, and must consequently feel a dependence which is much more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious, than too overbearing toward them.”

The ratification by a sufficient number of the States was obtained. On reference, however, to the proceedings of the State conventions, it will be seen that, in several of the States, the control by Congress, over the choice of Representatives merely, was strongly remonstrated against. That amendments were proposed for its qualification by the States of South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and New York. That most of them resolved that it should be a standing instruction to their Delegates in Congress to endeavor to effect that and other amendments proposed. The proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey, to which Mr. VAN BUREN had alluded, would, if adopted, break an important link in the chain of dependency of the General upon the State Governments. It would surrender to the General Government all control over the election of President and Vice President, by placing the choice of Electors on the same footing with that of Representatives. It would at this time be premature to go into a minute examination of the provisions of the resolution alluded to, to show that such would be its effects. Upon examination, it will be found that such would be its construction. That it does in substance what another proposition, upon their table, originating in the other House, does in words. But even was there doubt upon that subject, that doubt should be removed by an express provision, reserving to the States their present control over the election, except as to what is particularly provided for in the resolution now proposed. If it is fit to take from the States their control over the choice of Electors of President and Vice President, and give it to the Federal Government, it would be equally proper, under the popular idea of giving their election to the people, to divide the States into districts for the choice of Senators, as was proposed in the Convention, and give to Congress the control over their election also. If the system be once broken in upon in this respect, the other measure will naturally follow, and we will then have what was so much dreaded by those who have gone before us, and what he feared would be so much regretted by those who come after—a completely consolidated Government—a Government in which the State Governments would be not otherwise known or felt than as it became necessary to control them. To all this, Mr. VAN BUREN was opposed. He was so, because it was a matter not necessary or fitly connected with the subject under consideration; that being a question between the States themselves, as to their relative interest—a question which might and ought to be settled, and leave their relation to the Federal Government as it stands at present. The other is a question between the States, collectively, and the Federal Government, affecting most materially the relation they now bear to each other. But, even if it were presented under different circumstances, he would oppose it.

DECEMBER, 1823.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

Because, however ardent his attachment to the Federal Government, and however anxious he might be to sustain it, in the exercise of the powers given to it by the Constitution—and, in that respect, he would, he trusted, go as far as any man ought to go—he was unwilling to destroy or even release its dependence on the State Governments. At the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, it was a question of much speculation and discussion, which of the two Governments would be most in danger from the accumulation of influence by the operation of the powers distributed by the Constitution. That discussion was founded on the assumption that they were, in several respects, rival powers, and that such powers would always be found in collision. The best lights which could then be thrown upon the subject, were derived from the examples afforded by the fates of several of the Governments of the Old World, which were deemed to be, in some respects, similar to ours. But the Governments in question having operated upon, and been administered by, people whose habits, characters, tempers, and conditions, were essentially different from ours; the inferences to be derived from that source were, at best, unsatisfactory.

Mr. V. B. thought that experience (the only unerring criterion by which matters of this description could be tested) had settled for us the general point of the operation of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon the relative strength and influence of the respective Governments. It was, in his judgment, susceptible of entire demonstration, that the Federal Constitution had worked a gradual, if not an undue increase of the strength and control of the General Government, and a correspondent reduction of the influence, and consequently of the respectability of the State governments. The evidence in support of this position was abundant, and, if the matter should come under full discussion, could be readily afforded. He thought, further, that existing causes, which were every day gaining force, would, for the future, more rapidly increase that operation. He considered the qualified dependence of the General upon the State Governments as their strong arm of defence to protect them against future abuses. Under that view of the subject, he was opposed to so material a change of the present condition of the respective governments as would be produced by the amendment to which he objected. He was in favor of leaving matters, in that respect, as they stood. Under this impression, Mr. V. B. had prepared a resolution which avoided the defect attaching to that of the gentleman from New Jersey—requiring the contemplated division of the States into districts, to be coextensive with the number of Electors instead of Representatives, and at the same time secured the great object upon which he had been commenting.

Mr. VAN BUREN then introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States:

The Electors of President and Vice President of the United States shall be chosen by the people of the several States, in districts equal in number to the number of Electors to which each State is entitled, to be composed of contiguous territory, and, as near as may be, equal in the number of persons to be represented, or of persons qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The qualification of the voters at such election shall be the same as is required of Electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The Electors of President and Vice President, convened at the time and place appointed by law, for the purpose of giving in their votes, shall have power, in case any of them fail to attend, to choose an Elector or Electors, in the place of him or them so failing to attend. Congress may determine the time of choosing the Electors, the day or days on which they shall give their votes, which shall be the same throughout the United States. But the authority to divide the States into districts, for the choice of Electors; to direct the election to be held; to prosecute the manner thereof, except as to the time of holding the same, and the qualifications of the voters; and the place of meeting of the Electors aforesaid,—is reserved, exclusively, to the Legislatures of the several States.

If, upon counting the votes for President and Vice President, in the manner directed by the Constitution, it shall appear that no person has a majority of the whole number of the Electors chosen, it shall be the duty of the President of the Senate forthwith to notify the President of the United States thereof; who shall immediately by proclamation, and also by notification to the Executives of the several States, publish the number of votes given to each person as President. Whereupon, the Electors shall again meet on the day which shall have been by law appointed for that purpose, with the like power of supplying vacancies, and vote for one of the two persons as President who shall have received at the first meeting of the Electors the greatest number of votes for such office. Or, if it should happen that more than two persons have received the greatest, and also an equal number of votes, the said Electors shall vote for one of them as President. The said Electors shall thereupon transmit one of the lists, to be made at their first meeting, and also that made at their second meeting, signed and certified by them, to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, to be proceeded upon as the Constitution has prescribed, except that the person having the greatest number of votes at the second meeting of the said Electors shall be the President. But, if two or more persons shall have received the greatest and an equal number of votes at the second meeting of the said Electors, the House of Representatives shall choose one of them for the President of the United States, as now prescribed by the Constitution.

Both the resolutions were referred to the same committee to whom the other propositions for amending the Constitution have been referred.

TUESDAY, December 30.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred, on the 10th instant, the petition of Frederick W. Smith, a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, made a report, together with a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. RUGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jeremiah Manning, of New Jersey," reported it without amendment.

Mr. KING, of New York, presented the petition of William Vaughn, a sailing-master in the Navy of the United States, praying to be allowed prize money for two vessels captured during the late war. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, presented the petition of Dean Weymouth, praying an increase of pension.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELLIOTT presented the petition of James Hunter and John P. Williamson, of Savannah, Georgia, sureties of Benjamin Wall, late Marshal of the District of Georgia, praying an act may pass authorizing the equitable settlement of his accounts.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motions of the 26th instant, respecting the election of the officers of the Senate; and, on motion, by Mr. EATON, they were modified, as follows:

Resolved, That, when any vacancy happens in any of the offices of the Senate, the vacancy shall be supplied by ballot of the members present.

Resolved, That the Senate will, on the — day of the first session of the next Congress, elect, by ballot, the Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, and the Assistant Doorkeeper, together with the principal and engrossing Clerks; and on the third day of the first session of each and every Congress, thereafter, they shall, in like manner, appoint those officers.

The further consideration of the resolution was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. HAYNE, of the 29th instant, to inquire into the expediency of establishing a navy yard at Charleston; and agreed thereto.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. KING, of Alabama, proposing an inquiry concerning the expediency of granting a pre-emption to the quarter section of land each to several counties in the State of Alabama, for the location of their respective seats of justice, was again read, and agreed to.

Mr. ELLIOTT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an application to be made to the British Government, through our Minister at that Court, for a correct list of the names of such persons as may have been paid, with the sums received by each, for lands held by them in the Floridas, previous to the treaty of 1783, and of which they were deprived, on the transfer of that territory, by Spain, by virtue of the said convention.

The bill for the relief of Thomas W. Bacot, the Postmaster at Charleston, South Carolina, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr.

HAYNE stated that the object of the bill was merely to refund to the Postmaster the sum of $300, which he had paid as a reward for the arrest of a mail robber, and which he could not receive from the proper department, because the expenditure did not come within the strict letter of his instructions. This bill passed the Senate at the last session, but was not acted upon in the House. It had now passed that body, and, Mr. H. trusted, would meet with no opposition in the Senate. The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles M. Collier;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS AND TONNAGE.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to revive and continue in force certain acts relative to discriminating duties on imports and tonnage, together with the amendments reported thereto; and having agreed to the said amendments, and further amended the bill, it was reported to the House, and the amendments were concurred in.

Some discussion took place in regard to the details of the bill, in which Messrs. MACON, HOLMES of Maine, SMITH, BENTON, BARBOUR, LLOYD of Massachusetts, BROWN, and HAYNE, participated.

On motion by Mr. MACON, further to amend the bill, by inserting, section 4, line 3, after the word "nation," "whose independence the United States have recognised," it was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Elliott, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Kelly, Macon, Noble, Taylor of Indiana, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Brown, Chandler, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Illinois, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, McVaine, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, and Thomas.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative. The bill was then read a third time, by unanimous consent, and passed.

WEDNESDAY, December 31.

Mr. EATON presented the memorial of Rezin Rawlings and John Locke, executors of Daniel Rawlings, praying compensation for the transportation of a quantity of corn to various military posts on the Tennessee river during the late war with the Creek Indians. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Joseph C. Boyd, a division paymaster at Castine during the late war, stating that on account of the loss of papers, he is prevented from settling his accounts with the War Department; and praying an act of Congress for his relief.—Referred to the Committee on Claims.

DECEMBER, 1823.

Florida Land Titles.

SENATE.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill supplementary to an act to relieve certain persons from prison, with the amendment thereto, as adopted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted a report on the petition of Francis Henderson, jr., with a bill for his relief. The petitioner, for himself and family, claims compensation for certain military and diplomatic services rendered to this Government by his grandfather, the late Colonel John Laurens. The bill reported by the committee grants the sum of $23,500, in full for those services. The report was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, called up the petition of Colonel Alexander A. White, which was presented at the last session; and, on motion of Mr. J., the same was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLS presented the memorial of Amasa Stetson, stating that he was a deputy commissary during the late war; that, in the performance of the duties appertaining to his office, he had, at different times, advanced moneys from his own funds, for the use of the Government, and prays that he may be allowed interest on such advances, and also that he may be indemnified for losses which he sustained by the depreciation of Treasury notes received from the Government.—Referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KNIGHT submitted a resolution, instructing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an additional compensation to postmasters for stamping ship letters; which was read, and laid over for consideration.

The bill from the other House, for the relief of Thomas W. Bacot, Postmaster at Charleston, South Carolina, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the other House, for the relief of Charles M. Collier, was taken up in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Jeremiah Manning, of New Jersey, was postponed till Friday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Babbit;" a bill, entitled "An act to repeal, in part, an act, entitled 'An act to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned,'" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Bartlett and John Stearns, owners of the schooner Angler, and Nathaniel Carver, owner of the schooner Harmony, and others;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills last brought up for consideration were severally read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Babbit," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill entitled "An act to repeal, in part, an act, entitled "An act to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of William Bartlett and John Stearns, owners of the schooner Angler, and Nathaniel Carver, owner of the schooner Harmony, and others," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

It was ordered, that, when the Senate adjourn, it will adjourn till Friday next.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The resolutions, proposed some days since, by Mr. EATON, respecting the election of the officers of the Senate, were taken up for consideration. The first resolution, which provides for filling, by ballot of the Senate, such of the offices as may hereafter become vacant, was agreed to. The second, which provides for the biennial election of the Secretary of the Senate, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, Assistant Doorkeeper, together with the principal and engrossing Clerks, gave rise to some discussion. Mr. E. stated, generally, the grounds which induced him to move this resolution. He thought the trouble of electing its officers was not a sufficient excuse to the Senate for not exercising this important trust. He considered it important to the proper transaction of the business of the Senate, that its officers should be elective; that the best men would be most likely to be obtained in that way. And as a still stronger argument in favor of his motion, Mr. E. urged the Constitutional requisition that the Senate should elect its own officers. Messrs. LANMAN, ELLIOTT, MILLS, HOLMES of Maine, BARBOUR, BROWN of Ohio, KING of Alabama, and EDWARDS of Illinois, remarked upon the resolution; which was, subsequently, postponed till Friday next.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted a resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses, to present to their respective Houses all such acts of Congress as may expire during the session, and which the public service may require to be renewed; which resolution was read, and laid over for consideration.

FLORIDA LAND TITLES.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. ELLIOTT, was again read for consideration:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an application to be made to the British Government, through our Minister at that Court, for a correct list of the names of such persons as may have been paid, with the sums received by each, for lands held by them in the Floridas previous to the treaty of 1783, and of which they were deprived, on the transfer of that territory to Spain, by virtue of the said Convention."

Mr. ELLIOTT said that the object of his resolution would probably be apparent to the Senate; that it would be recollected that the Floridas were formerly in possession of the British Government, while we were colonies of that country; that, upon the transfer of the Floridas to Spain, it had been stipulated that such British subjects as chose to remain there, should be permitted to do so; but that a great proportion of those subjects had abandoned that country, and removed to Great Britain; and had since been compensated for the property they left there. But some others had removed to the United States, preferring to share the difficulties of our Revolution, and the subsequent blessings of our Government. Some of these persons had never received any compensation for the property they left, and it had now become necessary to decide upon their claims to lands in Florida. This could not be done correctly, without the information referred to in the resolution which was now under consideration. The heirs of many of these persons had come forward with their claims, and this information was wanted, to guard against imposition.

The resolution was agreed to.

FRIDAY, January 2, 1824.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of John Miller and others, and the memorial of Stetson Lobdell and others, citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying a revision of the tariff, for the purpose of affording additional protection to the manufactures of the United States. The memorials were read, and severally referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented a document in support of the claim of Robert Shaw, for the value of a horse lost in the service of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, presented the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, stating that their father, the late Colonel Robert H. Harrison, remained in the service of the United States as aid-de-camp and private secretary of General Washington, from the year 1775 to 1781; and praying to be allowed, in consideration thereof, the commutation of half pay, and the bounty in land, received by the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SMITH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requesting the President to employ a part of the engineer corps in exploring the country between the waters of the Alleghany and Susquehannah, and in ascertaining whether they can be connected by canals, so as to afford a navigation from one of those rivers to the other; and whether the streams so connected would afford means of transport; and the depth of water each connecting stream would furnish at different seasons of the year; what would be the probable cost of such canal, or canals, and what obstacle would be in the way of perfecting them.

Mr. NOBLE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the select committee on roads and canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying the act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned," in such manner that the road named in the said act shall be laid out through Columbus, Indianapolis, and Vandalia, the seats of government of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and to inquire also into the expediency of making a further appropriation for the purpose of completing the location of said road.

Mr. HAYNE communicated the following resolutions passed by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of South Carolina:

"IN THE SENATE, Dec. 19, 1823.

"Resolved, That the State of South Carolina regards with deep interest the noble and patriotic struggle of the modern Greeks to rescue from the foot of the infidel and the barbarian the hallowed land of Leonidas and Socrates; and would hail with pleasure the recognition, by the American Government, of the independence of Greece.

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives at Washington.

"Ordered, That the resolutions be sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

"By order of the Senate.

"WM. D. MARTIN, C. S."

"IN THE HOUSE, Dec. 20, 1823.

"Resolved, That the House do concur in the resolutions.

"Ordered, That they be returned to Senate.

"By order of the House.

"R. ANDERSON, C. H. R."

The resolutions were read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Chitwood;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain distillers within the county of Berks, in the State of Pennsylvania;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Kendall;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills brought up for concurrence were severally read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Gilbert, providing payment for property taken from him by the Sac Indians, the claim to which was relinquished by a treaty with that tribe. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the same committee, reported the bill for the relief of Loudon Case, without amendment.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on the case of Josiah Hook, junior, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles M. Collier," was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt;' and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The bill for the relief of Francis Henderson, junior, was read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Frederick W. Smith; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

The resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to present such acts as may expire, and in their opinion, require being continued in force, was read the second time, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the petition of Alexander A. White, of Louisiana, praying the right of pre-emption to a tract of land on which he has settled, so as to include his improvements. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The resolution submitted by Mr. EATON, providing for the biennial election of the officers of the Senate, was again taken up for consideration. Mr. LANMAN moved to strike out from the resolution that part which provides for the election of the principal and engrossing clerks. Without deciding on this motion, the further consideration of the resolution was postponed till Monday next.

The resolution submitted on Wednesday by Mr. KNIGHT, instructing inquiry into the expediency of providing, by law, some compensation to postmasters for marking ship letters, was again read; and, after some explanatory remarks by Mr. KNIGHT, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, gave notice that, on Monday next, he should ask leave to introduce a bill, the better to secure the accountability of public officers.

The bill from the other House for the relief of Jeremiah Manning, of New Jersey, providing payment for a quantity of hay, furnished to the troops of the United States during the late war, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. RUGGLES stated the grounds upon which the claim was predicated. The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

PORTRAIT OF COLUMBUS.

The following communication was received from the Department of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 1, 1824.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, a copy of a letter received at this department, from George G. Barrell, Consul of the United States at Malaga, and informing you that the picture mentioned in it, is at the office of this department, subject to such disposal of it as Congress may direct.

Having been some time retained at New York, to which place it was shipped by Mr. Barrell, it has very recently been received here in a frame, upon which is engraved the following inscription:

"Columbus."

"Presented to the nation, by G. G. Barrell, United States Consul at Malaga. The frame presented by Parker & Clover, picture framers, New York, A. D. 1823."

I avail myself of this occasion to state, that an exact fac simile, engraved on copperplate, has been made by direction of this department, of the original copy of the Declaration of Independence, engrossed on parchment, and signed by all the members of Congress on the 2d of August, 1776, as appears by the secret journal of that day. Two hundred copies have been struck off from this plate, and are now at the office of the department, subject to the disposal of Congress.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Copy of a letter from GEORGE G. BARRELL, United States Consul at Malaga, to the Secretary of State:

MALAGA, February 21, 1823.

SIR: A few days since I delivered to Charles A. Davis, Esq., a portrait of Columbus, in half length, which I obtained from Seville, and directed him to forward it to your Excellency, for the purpose of having it placed among the portraits of other distinguished men in the Capitol. You will find, by the certificate which accompanies it, that it was supposed to be by the same hand which painted the celebrated one in the Escorial, and only having undergone some retouches, of a trifling nature, to prevent its decay. If it is worthy of a place in the Capitol, it will afford me infinite pleasure, and if not, I can only say, my admiration for that extraordinary man led me to think an original likeness of him might be considered as a small mark of the veneration and love I bear my country.

With great respect, &c.

GEORGE G. BARRELL.

J. Q. ADAMS, Esq., Sec'y of State.

This communication, with the accompanying letter, was read and referred to the select committee appointed to make the proper disposition of the rooms in the centre building of the Capitol.

and Barnstable bay; and to report on the practicability of constructing a canal through the isthmus which separates the said bays, of sufficient depth and size to admit vessels of war to pass the same; on the obstacles thereto, and the estimated expense thereof; and on the benefits that would result to the public interests, in time of war, and to the domestic or coasting trade of the United States, in time of peace, from the construction of such a canal; which, after the completion of the Chesapeake and Delaware and Raritan canals, would extend an inland water communication from Albemarle sound to Massachusetts bay, passing, in its progress, through the territory, or along the borders of ten of the Atlantic States.

tain distillers, within the county of Berks, in the State of Pennsylvania," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Smith, a Lieutenant in the Navy, who prays remuneration for money belonging to the Government, lost while in service, was taken up for consideration. Mr. DICKERSON, in a few remarks, opposed the report of the committee, and concluded by moving to reverse it. Mr. RUGGLES stated the reasons which governed the committee in framing their report. The amendment proposed by Mr. DICKERSON was rejected, and the report concurred in.

The bill from the other House, for the relief of Loudon Case, providing payment for a yoke of oxen taken into the service of the United States during the late war, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. CASE OF FRANCIS HENDERSON, JR.

The bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, for the relief of Francis Henderson, jr. was taken up in Committee of the Whole. This bill provides for the payment "to Francis Henderson, jr., the grandson of the late Lieutenant Colonel John Laurens, of South Carolina, the sum of $23,500, in full for all claims of the legal representative of Colonel Laurens against the United States." The following is the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Lieutenant Colonel John Laurens, the ancestor whose services, civil and military, occupy a brilliant page in the history of the Revolution, entered the Army of the United States, as aid to the Commander-in-Chief, in August, 1777. In this situation, he displayed a zeal, courage, and devotedness, not surpassed by any of his compatriots. He conciliated the esteem of his commander, and of his brother soldiers, and, for his distinguished services, frequently received the thanks of Congress. In 1780, he had acquired so much of the confidence of his country, as to induce Congress, unanimously, to appoint him a special Minister to France, on a most important service. Such was his success in this mission, as again to call forth the public thanks of that body. He returned to this country in September, 1781, and at his special request Congress permitted him to join the Army, then conducting the siege of Yorktown, in Virginia, where fresh laurels awaited him. He finally fell, on the 27th August, 1782, in the lap of honor, fighting the battles of his country. His death was a national misfortune. He left an orphan daughter to the gratitude and to the protection of his country. A disinterestedness, even to carelessness, was a distinguished trait among his other qualities. Hence, for his long and important services, and the expenses attending the same, he seems neither to have kept an account, nor to have received any advances, except a small sum, to which hereafter a more particular reference will be made.

The father dead—his only child an infant and an orphan—and the grandfather, Henry Laurens, in captivity in England—there was no one to assert her claims.

Eventually, the grandfather returned from Europe, and, in 1784, as the guardian of the child, presented her case to Congress, who came to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That, in settling the accounts of the late Lieutenant Colonel John Laurens, as special Minister to the Court of Versailles, he be allowed the same pay that was given at this period to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States at foreign Courts, from the time of his appointment to that embassy, until his return; and that the balance remaining due for his services as Minister be paid to his representatives."

This resolution was not acted upon till 1790. The accounts of the father, Colonel Laurens, in both characters, as Colonel and as Minister, were settled. But it is objected by his legal representative, the petitioner, (who intermarried with Frances Eleanor Laurens, the only child of Colonel John Laurens,) and, in the opinion of the committee, justly, that in the settlement no allowance was made for the expenses of Colonel Laurens while on his foreign mission, although, at that time, no advances being made our foreign Ministers as an outfit, it was the usage of the Government to pay their expenses; and more especially, too, as Congress had expressly directed that, in the adjustment of the account, his compensation should be the same as that of other Ministers.

No account having been kept by Colonel Laurens of his expenses, the committee have, of course, no certain data by which to ascertain the amount; in the absence of which, they have been compelled to resort to other circumstances, for the purpose of arriving at any satisfactory result. These are, 1st. That it is in proof Colonel Laurens paid his own expenses, as well as those of his suite. 2dly. He took up, at Nantes, on the credit of his father, £1,000 sterling, equal to $4,444 44. 3dly. He received from Dr. Franklin, the then resident Minister in France, $2,171 42; and, 4thly, on his return to the United States he received, at Boston, where he landed, $720 from the Superintendent of Finance, to enable him to join the army before Yorktown, in Virginia. The committee, therefore, have assumed these sums, as furnishing the probable amount of his expenses; in which they have the more readily acquiesced, as it was about equal to the sum, in proportion to the time, allowed Silas Deane, a contemporary Minister at that Court, for his expenses.

The claim for $101 85, results from the improper application of the scale of depreciation to the item for rations, in the military account of Colonel Laurens, who, unconnected with any State regiment, would be deprived of the compensation which his brother officers received, if it be not awarded by Congress; and, therefore, the committee deemed it reasonable to allow it. The claim for $104 70 is obviously just, as it arises from an omission in extending and adding up the account. Uniting these two sums with his diplomatic expenses, produces an amount of $7,542 41, which, with interest, at five per cent. from the fifth September, 1781, the day of his return from Europe, is equal to $23,500. In allowing the charge for interest, from the above period, the committee have been guided by the resolution of Congress above referred to, and the report on which it was founded, which directs that the child of Colonel Laurens should receive whatever was, in equity and justice, due the father; and for the further reason, that the grandfather, in fixing the portion of the daughter of John Laurens, by his will, deducts therefrom the advances made the son, of which the sum taken up by him at Nantes is a part, with interest from the time of such advances.

The committee, in reporting a bill directing the money to be paid to Francis Henderson, jr., the only grandchild of Colonel Laurens, has, independently of its fitness, conformed to the consent of Francis Henderson, the elder, signified by a letter from him, and among the documents.

Mr. BARBOUR stated the grounds of this claim, and commented feelingly and eloquently upon the distinguished services which Colonel Laurens had rendered the country. In the appropriation of the sum named in the bill, Mr. B. said the committee had not estimated the interest on the moneys which were justly due a long time since to Colonel Laurens. He thought this ought, in justice, to be added to the amount to be granted; and therefore moved that the sum of $23,500 be stricken out from the bill, and the sum of $26,700 inserted in its stead.

The allowance of interest was opposed by Messrs. LANMAN, HOLMES, of Maine, MACON, and VAN BUREN, on the ground that the claim had not been before presented, and that the same principle which had been adopted in the settlement of other claims, of a similar nature, should be preserved in this case.

The question having been divided, the motion for striking out $23,500 prevailed; but, before the question was taken on inserting the sum proposed by Mr. BARBOUR, the bill was ordered, on motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, January 6.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act appropriating a sum of money to Benjamin Huffman, of the State of Indiana;" a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the laying out and opening certain public roads in the Territory of Florida;" also a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Wharton;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the petition of Celestin Moreau, of the State of Louisiana, praying the confirmation of his title to a tract of land, purchased in the year 1792, and of which, since that time, he has had quiet and undisturbed possession. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of Oliver Keating, a respectable merchant of Boston, stating that, in 1807, he loaded a vessel exclusively with the produce of the American fisheries, for Marseilles; that, on approaching the port, the vessel was spoken by a British vessel of war, and, on entering the harbor of Marseilles, was taken possession of by a French national ship, and both vessel and cargo were condemned, contrary to the faith of treaties, and the law of nations, under the Berlin and Milan decrees, issued after the sailing of his vessel, and praying Congress to grant such relief as he may be entitled to receive, and they may think proper to grant. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the memorial of Samuel Slater, and others, a committee appointed by the manufacturers of cotton, and others interested in the manufacture of that article, in the State of Rhode Island, representing the embarrassments to which they are subjected by the provisions of the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage; and praying a revision of the tariff of duties, with a view to the encouragement of the manufactures of the United States. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to consider and report therein.

Mr. DICKERSON presented the memorial of Benjamin Jones, and others, of the city of Philadelphia, praying additional duties on foreign iron imported, and on certain manufactures thereof. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. FINDLAY submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requesting the President to employ part of the engineer corps in ascertaining whether it be practicable to make a canal navigation from the River Delaware or Schuylkill, at or near the city of Philadelphia, by the city of Lancaster, to the River Susquehanna, and to connect, by canals, the waters of Alleghany River and Lake Erie, and to ascertain the quantity of water each connecting stream would furnish, at different seasons of the year, making an estimate of the expense of completing the canals respectively, and noting other necessary circumstances in relation to the object.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the distribution of the public documents, journals, reports, and laws of Congress, annually, to the several incorporated libraries within the United States.

to whom was referred, on the 30th ultimo, the petition of Joseph C. Boyd, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph C. Boyd, which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. R., from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the 31st ultimo, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Babbit," reported the same without amendment.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. EATON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to revive and continue in force "An act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices, and of the librarian," passed the 18th of April, 1818; which was twice read, by unanimous consent.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Loudon Case," was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Josiah Hook, junior; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Francis Henderson, junior; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred, on the 29th ultimo, the bill entitled "An act further extending the term of half pay pensions to the widows and children of officers, seamen, and marines, who died in the public service," reported it with an amendment; which was read.

The resolution offered yesterday, by Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of causing a survey of the best route for opening a navigable communication between Buzzard's Bay and Barnstable Bay, was again read and agreed to.

The resolutions offered yesterday by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, directing the Secretary of State to report to the Senate all such acts as will expire before the second week of the next session of Congress; and to report, in the first week of each session, all such laws as will expire before the second week in the next succeeding session, were again read, and gave rise to some discussion as to the department from which the information should be required. Some members thought it appropriate to the Department of State, others to the Attorney General, and others to a Committee of the Senate. Messrs. MACON, ELLIOTT, BARBOUR, HOLMES, of Maine, FINDLAY, SMITH, RUGGLES, and MILLS, severally remarked upon the subject, and the resolutions were then, on motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. KING, of Alabama, was read for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the 1st and 4th sections of an act, passed 2d March, 1821, for the relief of purchasers of public lands, prior to the 1st of July, 1820, so as to enable the holders of certificates (on which an extended credit has been allowed) to relinquish the same; or by making cash payments to receive a deduction of 37½ per cent. on the amount so paid."

After a few remarks from Mr. K., stating the provisions of the sections of the act proposed to be extended, the resolution was agreed to.

The resolution offered a few days since, by Mr. SMITH, instructing an inquiry into the expediency of exploring, by the Engineer Corps, the country between the Alleghany and Susquehanna rivers, with a view to their connexion by a canal, was called up for consideration. Mr. FINDLAY submitted an amendment, which he afterwards withdrew, and offered in the form of a separate resolution. Mr. KING, of New York, made a few observations, against carrying the policy of making roads and canals, from the public funds, to the extent contemplated by this and similar propositions. The resolution was agreed to.

The bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of William Bartlett and John Stearns, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole. The object of this bill is, to grant the bounty to two fishing vessels belonging to Plymouth, Massachusetts, which were shipwrecked, and therefore unable to comply with all the requisitions of the law allowing a bounty to vessels engaged in the fishing trade. Mr. SMITH stated the view which the Committee on Finance took of this subject. Messrs. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, LANMAN, and MILLS, advocated, and Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, and MACON, opposed the bill; and, on motion of Mr. LANMAN, it was laid on the table.

SAMUEL GILBERT.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Gilbert was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Claims, stated that the bill provided compensation for property taken by the Sac Indians, after they had been informed of the Treaty of Peace between the United States and Great Britain; that, although the tribe was bound, by treaty, to make restitution of the property so taken, yet, from motives of policy, the Government had seen fit to release them from the obligation to restore it.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Illinois, gave some information as to the terms of the treaty, by which the claim to this property was relinquished.

Mr. CHANDLER thought that this claim partook somewhat of the nature of a great many others now before Congress, and that its passage might involve the allowance of all claims to property taken from citizens of the United States, the claim to which was afterwards surrendered by treaty.

Mr. SMITH thought the reason, advanced by the gentleman from Maine, the very one which should urge the allowance of this claim. He believed the Government ought to make restitution for the property of its citizens surrendered by treaty.

Mr. BARBOUR said, if the bill involved so important a principle as that intimated by the gentleman from Maine, it ought not to be acted upon by the Senate without further reflection. He therefore moved its postponement to this day week.

SENATE.

Case of Francis Henderson, Jr.

JANUARY, 1824.

Mr. KING, of New York, remarked upon the nature of claims upon the Government for property captured by foreign nations, &c. He considered it the duty of a nation, a duty which it owed to itself and to its citizens, to exert all the means in its power to obtain recompense for private property captured by other nations—but, when those means had been exhausted, that nation was no longer bound to withhold from the completion of a treaty, nor to provide payment for all claims for property so captured, &c.

Mr. SMITH coincided perfectly with the rule laid down by the member from New York—but, he considered, that, where a foreign nation agreed, by treaty, to make restitution for property captured, and afterwards our Government had consented, for a valuable consideration, to strike out that article from the treaty, they were bound to compensate the citizens having such claims.

The motion of Mr. BARBOUR, to postpone the bill to this day week, prevailed.

WEDNESDAY, January 7.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting an abstract exhibiting the expenditures, under the head of "Contingent Expenses," from the first of October, 1822, to the 30th of September, 1823, prepared in obedience to the act of Congress, passed 3d of March, 1809; which was read.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the 15th December, the petition of Charles B. Davis, made a report, together with a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of revising the act of Congress entitled "An act further to establish the compensations of officers of the customs, and to alter the collection districts, and for other purposes," passed 7th May, 1822, and making such amendments thereto, as a change of circumstances may have rendered necessary and proper.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration: which was read:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate (if in his opinion it can be done without injury to the public interest) such information as will show the state of the relations between Spain and the United States, from the ratification of the Florida treaty up to the present time; and the effect produced on those relations by the United States having established diplomatic intercourse with the independent Governments of South and North America.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act to authorize the surveying and making a road from a point opposite to Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, to Little Rock, in the Territory of Arkansas;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill from the House of Representatives entitled "An act to authorize the surveying and making a road from a point opposite to Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, to Little Rock, in the Territory of Arkansas," was twice read, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion, of the 6th instant, relative to a canal from the River Delaware, or Schuylkill, at or near the city of Philadelphia, by the city of Lancaster, to the River Susquehanna; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion, of the 6th instant, to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the distribution of the public documents, journals, and laws, to the several incorporated libraries within the United States; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

A bill for the relief of Joseph C. Boyd was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act appropriating a certain sum of money to Benjamin Huffman, of the State of Indiana," was read the second time.

A bill, entitled "An act authorizing the laying out and opening certain public roads, in Florida," was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Wharton," was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Bartlett and John Stearns, owners of the schooner Angler, and Nathaniel Carver, owner of the schooner Harmony, and others," and, no amendment having been made, it was reported to the House, and passed to a third reading.

CASE OF FRANCIS HENDERSON, JR.

The bill reported in Senate, by the Committee on Foreign Relations, for the relief of Francis Henderson, jun., the grandson of the late Colonel John Laurens, was again taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. The question was upon inserting $26,700, as the sum to be granted, instead of $23,500, the sum reported by the committee—the addition proposed being for interest on the sum which the committee states to be due for the services of Colonel Laurens. On the allowance of interest, a further discussion took place, in which Mr. BARBOUR supported, and Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, SMITH, MACON, HAYNE, and BENTON, opposed the allowance.

Mr. HAYNE said that, as the name of Laurens had been mentioned, and his services had been alluded to, in debate, he could not, with justice to his own feelings, refrain from adding his feeble tribute of respect for the virtues, and admiration of the character, of that distinguished man. He felt that he would be indulged by the Senate when they remembered that he represented the State which had been honored by giving birth to that illustrious hero, and which had been still more honored in being the scene of his glorious death.

Colonel John Laurens, said Mr. HAYNE, was the Bayard of America. Of him, if of any man who ever lived, it could, with truth, be said, "he was without fear and without reproach!" He brought to the service of his country a Roman form, and more than a Roman soul. If you sought for him in the day of battle, he was found at the post of danger; if at any other moment, he was found at the post of duty. The love of his country controlled every other feeling of his heart; it might almost be said to be that "in which he lived, and moved, and had his being." It had been supposed, said Mr. HAYNE, that Colonel Laurens was a rash man, wholly reckless of life; who rushed, with the instinct of the lion, on his foe, and who was regardless because he was insensible of danger. Some countenance had indeed been given to this idea by the historians of the day. But Mr. H. was strongly impressed with the belief that injustice had, in this respect, been done to the character of Laurens, and that his ardent enterprise and heroic courage had been mistaken for thoughtless desperation.

Laurens possessed a highly cultivated mind. He was a man of thought as well as of action; "as great in counsel as in high resolve." It is not to be supposed, therefore, that such a man could have been insensible to danger. Mr. H. was satisfied, from facts within his own knowledge, that, although Colonel Laurens always felt himself compelled, by his noble nature and high sense of duty, to seek danger in his country's service, wherever it was to be found, yet he duly estimated the hazards of such conduct, and considered as probable the event by which he finally sealed, with his blood, his devotion to his country. When entering on his last campaign, he confided, to the care of a friend, a precious jewel, the gift of Louis XVI., with directions how it should be disposed of in the event of his fall. No, sir, said Mr. H., Colonel Laurens was neither insensible to danger nor indifferent to life. It was only when, to borrow the language of the immortal poet,

"He set Honor in one eye, and Death in t'other,
That he did look on Death indifferently."

The field of battle was not the only sphere in which Colonel Laurens displayed great talents and rare qualities. He was no less able as a negotiator than distinguished as a soldier. At the most critical period of the Revolution, Congress found it necessary to send to France for succor and support. They sought out Laurens in the camp, and confided to him a special mission to the Court of Versailles. His conduct on that mission was as striking and peculiar as it was eminently successful. He stamped his own high character on a transaction unexampled in the whole history of diplomacy. Arrived at the French Court, he trampled at once on all official forms, and, in the simple garb of an American soldier, pressed instantly into the presence of the Sovereign, eloquently and fearlessly explained the situation of his country, clearly pointed out the duty and interest of France, and demanded assistance. Patriotism and eloquence were signally triumphant. Laurens prevailed. He obtained at once that relief which was perhaps essential to the accomplishment of American independence, and which, if it had not been wholly denied to the usual course of tardy negotiation, might have come too late to produce the desired effect. Thus was the work of years accomplished in a few short weeks. But a few months had elapsed since Laurens had been seen in the ranks of the American Army, "in the thickest of the fight." And, now, (having, in the mean time, thrice crossed the Atlantic, and concluded a most important negotiation,) he was again on his native shores, bringing with him immense treasures, the fruits of his labors, and furnishing pay and clothing to the suffering soldiery. In a few days after his arrival, he was again found in the camp, marshalling to glory the soldiers of liberty. Mr. H. said, he would not attempt to follow him further in his glorious course. We all know that he fell at the head of his troops, gallantly fighting for the liberties of his country and the rights of mankind. It is delightful, said Mr. H., to reflect, that he fell "in the last of our fields," as if Providence, who had preserved him through so many perils, had permitted his career to be closed only when there were no more battles to be won.

It will hardly be believed by posterity that the hero, who fills so large a space in the annals of his country, died in his youth, not having yet attained his twenty-seventh year. As nearly connected with this subject, said Mr. H., it is worthy of remark, that Colonel Laurens was the purest and most disinterested of human beings. His political creed was that, in the hour of calamity, the life and fortune of the citizen is the property of his country, and that his services should be rendered gratuitously. Laurens received no pay, kept no private accounts, and most certainly never intended to demand, nor would have consented to receive any compensation for his invaluable services, military and diplomatic. It was in the same spirit that, on one occasion, he declined a commission in the Army, tendered him as a reward for his gallantry; not, assuredly, from insensibility to its value, (for military glory was the idol of his soul, and promotion the very reward for which his heart panted,) but because, as he himself declared, his promotion might give offence to older officers, and thus be injurious to the public service. Mr. H. said, he knew not how better to combine in one view the various traits which marked the character of John Laurens, than by adopting the eloquent language of the American historian:

"Nature had adorned him with a profusion of her choicest gifts, to which education had added its most useful as well as its most elegant improvements. Acting from the most honorable principles; uniting the bravery and other talents of a great officer, with the knowledge of a complete soldier, and the engaging manners of a well-bred gentleman—he was the idol of his country, the glory of the army, and the ornament of human nature."

Mr. BENTON opposed, not only the allowance of the interest, but of the principal, also, as proposed to be granted by this bill. He thought, as the daughter of Colonel Laurens was still alive, that she was the only person who had a just claim to the money proposed to be paid; and, if the bill were to pass, it should be in her favor.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, moved the recommitment of the bill, for the purpose of providing that the money shall be paid to the daughter of Colonel Laurens, or her assignee. But a motion to lay the bill on the table prevailed.

THURSDAY, January 8.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of the Army Register, for each member of the Senate, conformably to a resolution of the Senate, of December 13th, 1815.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the 29th December, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Brintnel Robbins, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by joint resolution, that there be prepared and published, under the direction of the Secretary of State, with the index now required by the resolution of the 3d March, 1818, a statement of the acts and parts of acts, and joint resolutions, of a public nature, which are limited in their duration, specifying the time or contingency by which their duration is limited; and, also, into the expediency of providing, as aforesaid, that there be prepared and published, as aforesaid, with the laws of the present session of Congress, a statement of the acts and joint resolutions, of a public nature, not yet expired, passed since the organization of the present Government, which are limited in their duration, specifying the time or contingency by which their duration is limited.

Mr. EDWARDS stated that his intention was to obtain, in a more correct manner, the object proposed in a resolution offered a few days since by a member from Maine. Instead of calling upon the Secretary of State to report to Congress, session after session, the acts which are about to expire, Mr. E. thought such information might be obtained in a much more simple and expeditious way, if it were attached to the index usually published with the laws—that the additional labor of specifying, in this way, the particular time when the laws expire, could not be great; and, also, where the expiration of the law depends upon any contingency, that such contingency should be expressed in the same way. This method would have the effect to furnish the information, not only to the Representatives of the people, but to the people at large—and all interested in the laws might avail themselves of the information.

The resolution was laid over for consideration.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, presented the petition of Mary Davis and Solomon Davis, heirs and representatives of Solomon Davis, deceased, stating that a contract was made between the Commissioner of the Public Buildings and the said Solomon Davis, for the supply of a quantity of Seneca stone; that a part of the stone delivered has been rejected by the Commissioner; and praying payment for the same, and the fulfilment of the contract on the part of the United States. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the petition of Francis Larche, of New Orleans, praying compensation for a negro man, who was impressed into the public service, and killed, during the invasion of Louisiana by the British. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Kendall," reported it without amendment.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred, on the 16th December, the petition of George De Passau, made a report, together with a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Bartlett and John Stearns, owners of the schooner Angler, and Nathaniel Carver, owner of the schooner Harmony, and others," was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Charles B. Davis, and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Josiah Hook, jr., and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution directing the Secretary of State, to report to Congress concerning the expiration of laws, reported the following resolution; which was read and passed to a second reading:

"Resolved, That there be added to the Standing Committees, consisting of five members each, directed to be appointed at the commencement of each session, with leave to report by bill or otherwise, the following:

"A Committee of Revision, whose special duty it shall be to report to the Senate, before the first day of March next, all such laws as expire before the close of the next session of Congress; and to make a similar report, on or before the first day of January, in each year."

The resolution submitted on Tuesday last, by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, instructing an inquiry "into the expediency of providing, by law, for the distribution of the Public Documents, Journals, Reports, and Laws of Congress, annually, to the several incorporated Libraries within the United States," was again read for consideration.

After some suggestions on the subject, from Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, Mr. LOWRIE, and Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, Mr. JOHNSON consented to modify his proposition, so as to make a general inquiry into the expediency of a further distribution of public documents; and, in this shape, it was agreed to.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. BARBOUR, was again read for consideration:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate, (if, in his opinion, it can be done, without injury to the public interest,) such information as will show the state of the relations between Spain and the United States, from the ratification of the Florida Treaty, up to the present time, and the effect produced on those relations, by the United States having established diplomatic intercourse with the independent Governments of South and North America."

Mr. BARBOUR stated, in a few words, the reasons that induced him to offer this resolution; and it was then agreed to.

OFFICERS OF THE CUSTOMS.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, directing an inquiry into the expediency of revising and amending the act of Congress, entitled "An act further to establish the compensation of officers of the customs, and to alter certain collection districts, and for other purposes," passed the 7th May, 1822, was again read for consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON, in support of his motion, said it had been fully shown, by experience, that the law in question absolutely required some amendment; in its present operation at New Orleans, and he believed at other places, it was certainly injurious to the interests of the country. In consequence of the reduction of his salary, the deputy collector at New Orleans had resigned his office; that office is now vacant, and likely to continue so; and it was apprehended that the collector would also resign his office; that, from the small salary allowed him, he was obliged to pay the contingent expenses of his office, which were considerable; leaving for himself but a small compensation for his services. When the unhealthiness of the climate, and the arduous nature of the duties of these officers, was considered, Mr. J. thought the propriety of some increase of their salaries must be evident. But, as the resolution merely proposed inquiry, he presumed there would be no objection to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

CASE OF FRANCIS HENDERSON, JR.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Francis Henderson, jr. This bill proposes to grant a sum of money to Francis Henderson, jr., in full for services rendered to the country, by his grandfather, Colonel John Laurens. The question before the Committee was upon a motion by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, to recommit the bill for the purpose of altering it, so far as to grant the money to Mrs. Henderson, the daughter of Colonel Laurens. This motion, at the request of Mr. BARBOUR, was withdrawn.

Mr. BARBOUR, after some further remarks on the nature of this claim, and in confirmation of those which he had previously made in Committee of the Whole, moved that the blank in the bill should be filled with the sum which the Committee originally reported to be due for the expenses incurred by Colonel Laurens.

Mr. LOWRIE said, that he had paid great attention to this subject, and he felt, after full investigation, that he could not vote for the bill, in any shape. As the subject had been discussed two days, he would now, in order to try the sense of the Senate, move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. ELLIOTT opposed the motion to postpone indefinitely. He said there could be no doubt that Colonel Laurens had really expended the moneys which the bill proposed to reimburse, and that the claim fairly came under the provision of Congress, existing at that time for the payment of the expenses of their foreign Ministers. The property left by Colonel Laurens to his family, had been diminished by these expenses; and it appeared no more than just that they should be paid. The circumstances under which the daughter was situated were such, that Mr. E. thought the money ought not to be given to her—he did not, therefore, see any impropriety in voting it to her son.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, said he understood the question, as to passing the present bill, not to turn upon the justice of the claim, but, whether the person, whose name was mentioned in the bill, was fairly and legally authorized to receive the money. It was not asked as a bounty, but as a remuneration for services rendered, and expenses incurred; and it was imperative upon the Government to pay its just debts; but it was also important to know who has the just claim to it. If Colonel Laurens had any claim upon the Government when he died, his daughter undoubtedly became the heir to that claim. When she married Mr. Henderson, he acquired the right to the claim. If the claim rests on the law, it is certainly highly important to know to whom it now belongs. If Congress were to pay it now, wrongfully, they would be bound, by every principle of justice, to pay it again hereafter, provided the proper person came forward to claim it. If Mr. Henderson were now separated from his wife, by covenant or contract, it became necessary to inquire how far that separation would affect the claim. What is the nature of that separation? Does it secure the right in this claim to Henderson? Until he could see some evidence on this subject, Mr. L. said he could not say what right the grandson had to receive this money. No one, Mr. L. remarked, could be more ready than himself to extend a fostering hand to those, and to the descendants of those who had rendered distinguished services to the country, and no one was more sensible of the importance of the services rendered by Colonel Laurens; but he wished, before he was called upon to vote on this subject, to know to whom the money was due, and who had a legal claim to it—suppose, by a contract with his wife, that Henderson had been prohibited from receiving the amount of this claim—under such circumstances, how could he transfer a right to his son, which he did not himself possess? If it were paid to the son, in such a case, Congress might be called upon, by the wife of Henderson, to pay it again. These reasons, Mr. L. said, would induce him to vote for postponement, reserving it to the justice of the country to recognise the claim, when it came forward in a less dubious shape.

Mr. LANMAN made some inquiry as to the items in Colonel Laurens's account, which had been allowed by the Government; in answer to which, Mr. BARBOUR furnished the information required.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Illinois, believed that nothing less than an absolute divorce could deprive Mr. Henderson, the father, of the right to receive this claim. As no divorce had taken place, he surely retained that right; and, if so, he could transfer it to his son. If nothing more than a separation, without a divorce, had taken place, it did not vitiate the right of Mr. Henderson; and, as he had assented to the grant being made in favor of his son, there was no doubt in his mind, Mr. E. said, that the son of Henderson had a fair claim.

Mr. BARBOUR intimated his wish, provided the motion to postpone indefinitely were withdrawn, to propose an amendment to the bill, so as to require the relinquishment of all claims by Francis Henderson the father, and Frances E. Henderson the mother, previous to the payment of the money to Francis Henderson, junior.

Mr. LOWRIE accordingly withdrew his motion for indefinite postponement, in order to admit the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, was in favor of the allowance of the claim; for, he believed that a wise liberality in conducting the affairs of the nation, was the most proper economy; he would not agree that one dollar of this money should go to the husband, or to the wife, in this case; but he felt perfectly willing to give it to the son, for his own exclusive use and benefit; he, therefore, proposed an amendment to strengthen the expressions used in that which was offered by Mr. BARBOUR.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, expressed his reluctance to legislate at all on this subject, at this time, and renewed the motion for its indefinite postponement.

Mr. HAYNE opposed the postponement; he could see no good reason for refusing to act upon the claim. There could be no doubt, he thought, in the mind of any gentleman present, that there did exist an equitable claim for the services of Colonel Laurens; he had left a daughter; that daughter had married, and her husband was living; they had a son. Now, either the daughter, her husband, or her son, or all of them together, were entitled to this money; and to one, or to all of them, it ought to be paid. In the strict sense of the law, no one could recover it. It was left to the equity of Congress to pay it; and, whichever of the persons in question were to receive it, Congress could never be expected to pay it a second time. Mr. H. thought the son the most proper person to receive it. There could be no doubt that the blood of Colonel Laurens flowed in his veins; he was now about twenty-five years of age, and just entering upon a professional life. In the morning of his days, this money would be of the utmost importance to him.

Mr. CHANDLER believed the gentleman from South Carolina was mistaken, when he said that no man doubted the justice of this claim—he, for one, did not believe this money to be due—he believed that Colonel Laurens had received all the pay he had expected, or wished, from the Government—and there had not been sufficient evidence produced to convince him that this debt was due. He should, therefore, feel compelled to vote against it. He had no doubt that Colonel Laurens had rendered very essential services to the country; nor did he wish to diminish their importance—but he did not believe the present claim to be founded in justice.

On motion of Mr. KELLY, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BENTON, from the Select Committee, to whom was referred the several resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, in regard to the election of President and Vice President, reported the following resolutions; which were read, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, &c., That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be a part of the said Constitution:

“For the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled. These districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled by the Constitution to be represented. In each of these districts, the persons qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, shall choose one Representative.

“For the purpose of choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress of the United States; which districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled by the Constitution to be represented. The persons qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, in each of these districts, shall choose one Elector.

“The Electors, when convened on the day and at the place prescribed by law for the purpose of voting for President and Vice President, shall have power, in case any of them shall fail to attend before noon of such day, to choose an Elector or Electors in place of him or them so failing to attend.

“The division of States into districts, as hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall have been adopted, and immediately after every future census, and apportionment of Representatives under the same. And such districts shall not be altered, until another census shall have been taken, and an apportionment of Representatives under it, shall have been made.

“When the lists of all persons voted for as President and Vice President, and the number of votes for each, shall have been signed, certified, and transmitted, sealed, to the Seat of Government, as required by the Constitution, the Senate and House of Representatives shall form a joint meeting, in which the President of the Senate shall preside, who shall open all certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

SENATE.

The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then, from the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the joint meeting shall immediately, by ballot, choose the President. A majority of the votes of all the members present shall be necessary to a choice on the first ballot, after which a plurality of votes only shall be necessary to a choice. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed. If no person have that majority, then he shall be chosen by the Senate, as directed by the Constitution.

Resolved, That no person, having been twice elected to the office of President of the United States, shall again be eligible to that office."

Mr. BENTON gave notice that he should call up the preceding resolutions, for consideration, a week from the next Monday.

FRIDAY, January 9.

Mr. LANMAN presented the petition of Samuel Peters, stating, he has become the purchaser of the title of the late Jonathan Carver to a tract of land at the Falls of St. Anthony, granted to him by two Sachems of the Sioux tribes, in the year 1767; and praying authority to take possession of the same. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. D'WOLF presented the petition of David Melville, of Newport, Rhode Island, stating that, in pursuance of an advertisement of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, he offered proposals for supplying the lighthouse establishment of the United States with oil, and keeping the lamps and apparatus in repair, which proposals were more favorable to the Government than those accepted, and praying such relief as may appear just and proper. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of James Edington, of Alabama, praying an act may pass to authorize his children to enter at the proper land office a section of land, at the minimum price, for reasons set forth in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the subject, on the 10th ultimo, reported a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MILLS presented the petition of Ebenezer Oliver, and others, of Massachusetts, stating that, conformably to the provisions of the act "providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands," they released to the United States their claims to certain lands; but that the commissioners appointed to investigate their title, having erroneous information of the laws of Georgia, did not award to them the indemnity provided in the act; and praying to be allowed the indemnity, or to be reinstated in their title to the lands released. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. D'WOLF, it was ordered, that the petition of Samuel Slater and others, manufacturers of cotton, in the State of Rhode Island, heretofore presented, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred, on the 16th instant, the petition of Joseph Wood, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Wood, of Ohio; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred, on the 29th ultimo, the petition of John Hall, made a report, together with a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The bill for the relief of Joseph C. Boyd, reported by the Committee on Claims, was taken up in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bills from the other House for the relief of Brintnel Robbins, and for the relief of William Kendall, were severally taken up in Committee of the Whole, reported without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

On motion, the report of the committee, to whom was referred the several resolutions, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, was recommitted.

The report of the Committee on Public Lands, unfavorable to the petition of George de Passu, was taken up for consideration. Mr. BARTON stated that the report was founded on the total want of evidence of the petitioner's title to the tract of land which he claims. The report was agreed to.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, instructing an inquiry into the expediency of publishing, with the index to the Laws, a statement of the acts, parts of acts, and joint resolutions, of a public nature, which are limited in their duration, specifying the time or contingency by which their duration is limited; was again read, and agreed to.

The resolutions reported yesterday by the Committee on the Judiciary, providing for the appointment of a committee of revision, to report such laws as expire previous to the first of January, in each year, was again read, and laid upon the table.

The bill for the relief of Josiah Hook, junior, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole. The bill provides for the payment of $1,165 to Josiah Hook, junior, collector of the port of Penobscot, in Maine, as indemnification for a judgment obtained against him, for the seizure of some cattle, within his district, during the late war, which he had reason to suppose were intended to be smuggled for the use of the enemy. Some observations upon the ground and merits of this claim were made by Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, EATON, VAN BUREN, and MILLS. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Jacob Babbit, of Bristol, Rhode Island, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole. Mr. RUGGLES explained the grounds of the bill. It provides that the interest of the duties upon a large quantity of sugar destroyed by the great storm in September, 1805, shall be remitted. The payment of the duties having been delayed, in consequence of the loss sustained by the owners, the bill proposes to release them from the interest on the same. The bill was reported to the Senate, without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

Mr. HAYNE gave notice that, on Wednesday next, he should call up the resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the election of President and Vice President; in order that members who wish to propose amendments to the resolutions may have an opportunity to do so.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices, and of the Librarian," passed 18th April, 1818; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

Mr. SEYMOUR submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to employ in his office an additional engrossing clerk, during the continuance of the sickness of Samuel Turner, junior; and that the person so employed shall be allowed and paid, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of four dollars per day.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee to whom was referred the resolution, introduced by Mr. DICKERSON, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the choice of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON, from the same committee, reported a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of the President of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion, by Mr. BENTON, the Committee to whom were referred, on the 16th December, the several resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, was discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions which have not been reported on.

NAVY PENSION FUND.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to the bill from the House of Representatives, further extending the term of half pay pensions to the widows and children of officers, seamen, and marines, who died in the public service, was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts said, that the object proposed by the bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, was to extend the time of certain pensions which had been already granted on the Navy Pension Fund; and that the amendment, reported by the committee, was intended to repeal another law, now in existence, in relation to the same fund; that, in order to enable the Senate to judge correctly whether it were proper to concur in the bill on the table, or to amend it as proposed by the Committee, it might be useful that he should briefly advert to the origin of the fund, its present state and situation, and the future prospects which were supposed to attend it. The Navy Pension Fund had its date in 1800. Prior to that time, during the Revolutionary war, and the early periods of the Federal Government, pensions had been occasionally granted to distinguished and meritorious Army and Navy officers, but no distinct fund had existed for the payment of those pensions, prior to the year 1800. At that time, Congress passed a law in which the prize money that had accrued during the quasi war with France, in 1798, and all money that should thereafter accrue to the United States from the sale of prizes, should, forever, be appropriated as a pension fund, for the purpose of providing for those officers, seamen, and marines, who had been disabled in the line of their duty, and become entitled thereto; and the faith of the United States was expressly pledged, if the fund should be found insufficient for this purpose, to make good the deficiency from its other sources of revenue; but, in case there should be a surplus income from the fund, beyond the charges on it, that then such surplus should be applied to making further provision for the disabled officers, seamen, and marines, and for such as, by a course of long continued and faithful services, might merit the gratitude of their country.

This was the origin of the pension fund, in 1800, but the law of that year no further applied to the cases now under consideration, than that it shows the commencement and object of the fund; that it was to be perpetual; that the faith of the Government was pledged to supply any deficiency; and that part of the original appropriation constituted a part of the existing fund at the present time, and carried along with it all the provisions of the original law.

Thus the fund rested until after the commencement of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, when, in January 1813, an act was passed, providing that, if any officer of the Navy or marines should be killed, or die by reason of a wound received in the line of his duty, the widow or child of such officer should be entitled to receive a pension for five years, equal to the half monthly pay of such deceased officer. The next year, 1814, the same provision was extended to seamen and marines; the pensions under both of these acts expired in course; and, in 1818 and 1819, other acts were passed, giving to those who enjoyed them an extended term of five years, making the pension for ten years instead of five; they have now again expired, or are about expiring, and the purpose of the present bill is to give them an extended operation of five years more, making the term of fifteen years instead of ten, as last provided.

In determining this question, the only interesting point with regard to it was, whether the income of the fund was sufficient for this charge upon it; for if it were not, as the faith of the Government was pledged to make up any deficiency, an inconvenient claim might be made upon its other resources. It had been endeavored, therefore, to ascertain this with precision, and Mr. L. believed he could very nearly, if not exactly, show the situation of the fund, even so late as the first of the present month.

There were then, as he understood, on the Navy pension list, three hundred and sixty-five male pensioners, receiving - - - - -	$27,282
Sixty-nine widows and orphans, of whom there were, as he believed, only three children, receiving - - - - -	10,130
	$37,412

To which might be added, the salary of the secretary of the fund, and some contingent expenses, probably making the aggregate disbursement for the past year, amount to $38,000.

Against this was to be placed the income of the fund, which consisted of $781,411, invested in the most secure fund on the face of the earth, the funded debt of the United States—which gave an interest this year of $45,934.

Ninety-nine thousand five hundred and two dollars, most unfortunately invested in the stock of one of the local banks, which, for the last six months, gave no dividend, and probably would not, for a considerable time to come; and, on which investment, if the stock were now sold, a loss would be sustained by the fund, of $70,000. And $29,000 of other bank stock, of better credit, in the District, which he would estimate as yielding, annually, a full rate interest of six per cent. per annum; thus giving, as the gross product of the fund, about $48,000—and leaving a balance in favor thereof, of $10,000.

This, Mr. L. said, was a cheering view of the subject, the unfortunate investment notwithstanding; and, recollecting that the fund has been created by the gallant enterprise of those whose descendants enjoyed it, that it was abundant for the purpose, and the pensioners to whom it was to be given had been selected heretofore as being worthy of the patronage, and entitled to the gratitude of their country, as the representatives of those who had nobly offered up their lives on the altar of patriotism, and had splendidly illustrated the naval character of their country, in every quarter of the globe, there could be no hesitancy in giving the extended term proposed, and in concurring with the bill from the House of Representatives, which the Committee unanimously recommended.

The section proposed to be added to the bill, and which provided for a repeal of part of the present system, remained to be considered. The law referred to, was that of 1817, to amend and explain an act for giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public and private armed vessels of the United States; which, probably, originated under the influence of one of those impulses of humanity, which do so much honor to nations as well as individuals, but which was so broad and naked in its provisions, that, when understood—and a knowledge of it was now, he believed, fast extending—as to absorb, if acted on according to its letter, not only any surplus which the fund might give, but also to make a heavy tax on the public Treasury. The act provides that, if any officer, seaman, or marine, belonging to the Navy of the United States, shall die, (the expression gives a prospective operation, and the law is unlimited as to duration,) or shall have died, since 1812, in consequence of disease contracted, or of casualties, or of injuries, received while in the line of his duty—his widow or child shall be entitled to a half monthly pension for five years; and under the wording of this act, it is contended that, admitting men are received into service in good health, scarcely a death can occur, but what may be traced or attributed to some disease, casualty, or injury, received in the course of his duty; and the marine, perhaps a loose or itinerant member of society, who enlisted yesterday, if killed last night, while on duty as a sentinel round the Capitol, by the fall of a tile from its roof, or who, from patrolling its damp arcades, caught a catarrhal affection, producing consumption and terminating in death—the seamen who died in the Congress frigate off Manilla, or at the Havana, those who were sufferers under Captain Spence on the coast of Africa, and the victims to the epidemic at Thompson's Island the last Summer, are all of them entitled to give to their widows, or children, if they have them, a right to the claim of a pension or half monthly allowance of five years, under the present act. This, he would observe, is not an idle apprehension; cases have occurred under it, and are increasing, while the commissioners, unwilling to admit a construction which they do not believe was ever contemplated, are still precluded by the letter of the law, from decisively rejecting the claims which have already arisen, and which cannot but rapidly multiply.

It never was, nor could have been, in the contemplation of the Government to give to every common seaman or marine, who, in time of peace, might die by disease contracted, or casualty occurring in the course of his duty, a right, after a day or month's service, to place his widow or his child on the pension list for five years; it was a perversion of the pension act, although the literal construction was a correct one, as he understood, in the opinion of the commissioners, as well as others; and to prevent the extension of this evil, after most scrupulously guarding the rights of all those who had received pensions, and of all those also who might, by possibility, be entitled to them up to the date of the repeal of the act, the amendment now offered was recommended, and in this recommendation the committee were also unanimous. The effect of it, if adopted, would be, to restore the pension fund to its original and legitimate uses; one of which, and perhaps the most important, was to excite to deeds of noble daring, and chivalrous achievement, the officers and seamen of our country, by the assurance which was given them that, if superannuated after long and faithful services, or if disabled, they would receive succor from their Government; or if slain, or dying from honorable wounds, that their widows and orphans should receive support, at least for a term of five years, from the proceeds of a fund, which ought sacredly to be preserved for these most useful purposes; leaving new or individual cases which may occur hereafter, to be provided for according to their merits.

These, Mr. LLOYD said, were the views which influenced the Committee, and which he had thought it respectful to the Senate to communicate.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, who also offered some remarks on the subject, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

SMITH, BARBOUR, KING of New York, LANMAN, LOWRIE of Maryland, and LLOYD of Massachusetts, engaged. CHANDLER, SMITH, BENTON, LOWRIE, KING, of New York, EATON, and HAYNE, the bill was laid over to Monday.

Mr. KING, of New York, submitted the following motion for consideration:

There was not before the Senate sufficient information at present, to authorize its acting on the subject; there was a want of particularity as to the probable cost of the road, its length, advantages, &c., which ought to be had before the Senate passed this bill. It was probable, moreover, that the question as to the construction of roads by the Government, would soon come before the Senate in a more enlarged and general form, which it was proper to consider first, and decide, whether it was expedient for this nation to commence the system of internal improvement, and the employment of the public treasure in the construction of roads, &c. Mr. K. made a number of remarks on the subject, indistinctly heard, but understood to indicate that he was opposed to the application of the resources of the Union to the purpose of making roads, &c. He concluded by moving that the bill be laid on the table for the present; which motion prevailed—ayes 22.

The Senate took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the Postmaster General to discontinue, at his discretion, the transportation of the mail on any post routes where the net proceeds of such route shall not exceed — per centum of the expenses thereon.

Mr. LANMAN moved to fill the blank with one-third.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, opposed the bill at some length, chiefly on the ground of its total inexpediency, and particularly of the hardness of its operation on Louisiana, and other parts of the Union thinly inhabited, where the transportation of the mail was expensive, in consequence of wide water courses, &c., and where they would scarcely have a mail at all, if the bill passed. He dissented, also, from the propriety of giving to the Postmaster General a power so great, and affecting so seriously the convenience of the people of all the new States. He should disapprove of the bill in any shape, but especially with the blank filled as proposed, as, with such a limitation, it would deprive Louisiana of many of her post routes, although a single city in that State yielded probably revenue enough from postages to pay for transporting all the mails of the State.

The bill was also opposed by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, and Mr. KING, of Alabama, on grounds similar to those of Mr. J.; they thinking that a general law on the subject would operate with unjust severity on certain sections of the country; and for the purpose of destroying the bill, Mr. K. moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. BARBOUR opposed the bill on principle, it being, as he contended, at war with the duty of the Government and the highest interest of a Republic—the diffusion of knowledge among the people. The small expense, he argued, ought not to be considered in comparison with such an object; and if it was for the purpose of economy that the measure was introduced, he thought the pepper-corn which would be saved by it was not worth gaining in this way—if retrenchment was necessary it should be resorted to in the great branches of expenditure, the military and naval establishments, &c., not by curtailing the diffusion of information amongst the people because they were remote or thinly settled, &c.

Mr. LANMAN replied and justified the expediency of the bill, on the ground of the necessity which existed for economising the revenue of the Post Office Department, the expenditure of which was, in consequence of the existence of so many unproductive post routes, greater than its receipts. He admitted the great importance and value of diffusing information among all the citizens of the Republic, but this was a privilege which might be paid for too dearly, and he thought the measure would be expedient. He moved, instead of the indefinite postponement, that the bill be laid on the table; which was carried.

On motion by Mr. BARTON, the Committee on Public Lands were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, referred to the committee on the 15th instant.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to purchase the seven per cent. stock of the United States in the year 1824," in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

land having been reported by the committee, correctly engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

THE RIGHT OF PRE-EMPTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Public Lands unfavorable to the petition of Colonel Alexander A. White, who petitioned Congress to grant him the right of pre-emption to a small tract of public land, which he had settled, on the west bank of the Mississippi river.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to reverse the report, and, in support of this motion, he explained the nature of the claim, and offered his views at some length. It appears, from his statement, and from the papers which he read, that the petitioner was a distinguished officer of the late war; that, when disbanded in 1815, being unable to purchase lands, and not knowing that the act of Congress, granting the right of pre-emption to settlers on the public lands in Louisiana, had expired, he settled on a tract of land belonging to the United States, situated on the Mississippi river, in the parish of West Baton Rouge, and had built houses, drained lands, and made considerable improvements thereon; that he had made a public road, and a levee, for near three miles in front of the land, which had reclaimed a considerable portion of the public lands from the inundation of the river, and added greatly to the value of the public lands in the vicinity. He prayed that Congress would grant him a donation, or pre-emption right to the land in question.

Mr. J. said, that the committee had reported against the claim, on the ground that the petitioner had settled in violation of the act of Congress of 1807, prohibiting settlements upon the public lands. He contended, that the act alluded to was passed to meet one or two cases of extraordinary character, and not to prevent emigration to the West, and that Congress had, in numerous instances, since that act passed, granted the pre-emption right to settlers in the new States and Territories; that sound policy required that the practice should still be continued; that it should be the object of the Government to strengthen the most exposed parts of the Union, by a dense white population; that such a population was particularly required in Louisiana, to protect the country against internal commotion and external invasion; and he argued to show, that such a course would operate even to the advantage of the Government, in a pecuniary point of view, as it would add to the value of the public lands in the neighborhood. He complained of the delay, on the part of the Government, in not surveying and bringing into market the public lands in Louisiana, in consequence of which, those who had removed to that country had not been afforded an opportunity of purchasing public lands: and that emigration had been repelled from the country. Mr. J. contended, that, from the circumstances he had stated, this was one of the strongest cases which could occur; that the petitioner had been an officer of distinguished merit; that he had enlisted a company of men, and served with great reputation throughout the Creek war; that, at New Orleans, in an attack on the enemy, he was severely wounded, in consideration of which, and for his gallant conduct on that occasion, he was brevetted to the rank of a Lieutenant Colonel. Mr. J. said that, if distinguished services, if gallant conduct in action, if wounds received in fighting the battles of the country, give claims upon the favorable consideration of the Government, Colonel White was entitled to that consideration. He concluded by remarking, that the honorable member who commanded at New Orleans, (alluding to General Jackson,) would, he was persuaded, testify to the gallantry and distinguished services of Colonel White.

Mr. JACKSON confirmed the representation which had been made of the meritorious conduct of Colonel White, in the campaign at New Orleans, where he was, in the battle of the 23d December, severally wounded; and Mr. J. observed, that, if gallant conduct, meritorious services, and severe sufferings, entitled any man to the boon he asked for from the Government, no one could have stronger claims than Colonel White, and he, for one, should give the petitioner his vote.

A debate ensued on this subject which, from the number and talents of the gentlemen who engaged in it, and the earnestness and ability displayed, rendered it interesting, and would have entitled it to a full report, had the principle involved not repeatedly, heretofore, been the subject of the deliberations and acts of Congress.

Besides the gentlemen above named, the application of the petitioner was advocated by Messrs. SMITH, LANMAN, BENTON, and BROWN; and it was opposed by Messrs. BARTON, LOWRIE, VAN DYKE, CHANDLER, BARBOUR, KING, of New York, and MACON. In support of the claim were urged principally the reasons stated above—the merits and services, and poverty, of the petitioner; the worthlessness of the land, in its natural condition, before the petitioner had reclaimed it by his labor, by the erection of embankments to keep the river from overflowing it, &c.; the additional value which this settlement and the improvements gave to neighboring public lands; the propriety of granting pre-emptive rights to encourage the settlement of the waste public lands; former exceptions made by Congress to the law, &c. On the other hand, were urged the settled policy of the nation, solemnly adopted by Congress, in the passage of an act, forbidding all persons from settling down on any of the public lands; the impropriety of holding out encouragement to persons to violate the law by granting pre-emption to this petitioner who had, contrary to law, established himself on the public lands; that in acting on such a case the merits of the individual (which all acknowledged) ought not to be taken into consideration; that if the prohibitory law was wrong, it ought to be repealed, but while in existence it ought to be rigidly enforced, and not have impunity and encouragement held out to disregard and violate it, &c.

The debate continued, with much animation, until three o'clock.

The question being taken on Mr. JOHNSON'S motion to reverse the report and grant the prayer of the petitioner, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Edwards of Connecticut, Hayne, Jackson, Johnson of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Ala., Lanman, Smith, and Talbot—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, King of New York, Knight, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Williams—32.

The report of the committee was then agreed to.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said that, by an act of Congress, the sum of $10,000 per annum, was appropriated for the purpose of civilizing the Indian tribes in the vicinity of the United States; that it had been apprehended, by the wording of that act, that the sum, thus appropriated, could be applied to the civilization only of such tribes of Indians as are located on the frontiers of the country; that several of the States had Indian tribes within their limits, who were as fit subjects for the provisions of the act as any others, and whose situation promises as much success in any attempt at improving their condition; that, in the State of Maine, there were two of this kind, the Penobscot and the Passamaquoddy tribes. Mr. H. remarked, that the law required an annual exhibition to Congress, of the expenditure of the sum appropriated; but that he had not seen such a statement. His present object, however, was to inquire whether the act might not be so modified as to extend the benefits of its provisions to other Indians than those situated on the frontiers. He therefore submitted the following resolution, which was read, and laid over for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire whether any alterations are necessary, in the act "making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements," so as to authorize a part of the fund, provided by the act, to be applied to the instruction and civilization of the Indians in the State of Maine, or any other State where such Indians are not adjoining "frontier settlements."

ment, the quantity of cordage, manufactured from hemp of domestic growth, which has been used in the service of the Navy since the year 1812; and the reasons, if any, why cordage manufactured from domestic hemp cannot be used as advantageously, and as economically, for the Navy of the United States, as cordage manufactured from imported hemp.

Messrs. KING, of New York, BRANCH, HOLMES, of Maine, CHANDLER, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, LANMAN, and HAYNE, took part in this discussion, which resulted in the reference of the resolution to a select committee of five members; and Messrs. The bill from the House of Representatives making an appropriation for opening a road from opposite Memphis, on the Mississippi, to Little Rock, in the Territory of Arkansas, was taken up.

Mr. CHANDLER, conceiving that the decision on this bill would in effect settle what the sense of the Government is, in the long agitated question of internal improvements, said he should ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

Mr. BROWN said if this bill could settle that question, it had been settled long since, as similar acts had been passed, &c. The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and was carried.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution, introduced by Mr. DICKERSON, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the choice of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and the election of President and Vice President of the United States, together with the amendment reported thereto; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The petitioners pray that certain stamp duties, which they paid on the notes of their bank, in the year 1817, may be refunded, for certain reasons stated in their petition. Mr. D'WOLF opposed the report, and moved an amendment, so as to reverse the effect of the report. Messrs. SMITH, HOLMES, of Maine, and LLOYD, of Massachusetts, also spoke against the report. The motion of Mr. D'WOLF prevailed, and the report was recommitted, with instructions to bring in a bill.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of extending the provisions of an act for the civilization of the Indians on the frontiers, to the tribe of Indians within the United States, was again read and agreed to.

SETTLEMENTS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The resolution proposed yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of repealing the act of Congress, "preventing settlements being made on the public lands, until authorized by law," was again read for consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON, in support of the resolution, said that, in the discussion which had taken place a few days since, upon the claim of Colonel White, the act mentioned in this resolution had frequently been alluded to, and several members had expressed their opinion that it ought to be repealed. Being of the same opinion himself, knowing that the operation of the law was very injurious to the interests of the State of Louisiana, and believing that it could never be the true policy of the Government to prevent the settlement of its lands; he had proposed an inquiry into the propriety of repealing that law. He thought that, so far from preventing the settlement of these lands, the Government should do all in its power to encourage it. Vast tracts of lands in the State of Louisiana yet remain unsettled, and it is not in the power of the State, under the present circumstances, to do any thing towards their settlement. Many of the lands in question had not even been surveyed. The power of the United States to hold such lands, waste and useless to the State in which they are situated, is doubted by many of the most enlightened and intelligent men. It was an opinion entertained, Mr. J. said, by many persons, who were highly competent to judge in such a case, that when the State was admitted into the Union, with all the privileges and powers belonging to the other States, that it had a right to the control over these lands—at any rate, to whomsoever this power belongs, it is obvious that the settlement of lands ought to be facilitated, and with a view to that object, he had submitted this resolution; as it merely proposed an inquiry into the expediency of repealing the law, he trusted it would not be objected to.

Mr. KING, of New York thought it an unusual course to refer a subject of this kind to a committee; as it could as well be settled by the Senate, without such reference. He dissented entirely from the opinions advanced by the gentleman from Louisiana—he thought the true policy of the country was, to prohibit, by all possible means, the unlawful settlement of its lands. These lands had been purchased of the Indians, with money from the public Treasury—surveys had been instituted, at great expense to the nation—and the prices, which the Government now puts upon its lands, are so very low, that no reasonable man can require that they should be less. The terms upon which they are offered are highly advantageous to every one who is desirous to go there, and make settlement. Although the policy of France and Spain had been different, in regard to the settlement of public lands, yet, Mr. K. thought our policy far the most unexceptionable, as it provides for a regular, just, and moral settlement, by fair and legal titles. Every one who wished to become the possessor of a portion of the land in question, could easily acquire a sure title to it. If such a regular and orderly settlement was to be produced, it could only be done by adhering to the system which the Government has adopted. Mr. K. asked gentlemen to consider, if the public lands were thrown open to every one who saw fit to settle upon them, without price and without title, whether there could be any guarantee for the security of property, in such a settlement.

If those extensive tracts of country of which the gentleman had spoken, were settled in that way, men would be sent to Congress to make laws for the people, who had themselves entirely disregarded the laws and the rights of property. Such a state of things would be deplorable indeed. The only men who are fit to make laws for the people, are those who hold their property by a just and fair title. He believed that Congress had ever been willing to do, and had done, every thing that was fair and equitable, to encourage the settlement of the public lands; and he had always thought that the system now acted on had greatly advanced that object. The greatest difficulties which had been encountered in the business, had arisen from the uncertainty of the French and Spanish titles. If this law, which is so necessary to the credit and the happiness of the country, were repealed, such a repeal would have a strong tendency to subvert the proper settlement of the lands belonging to the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON briefly replied to Mr. KING. Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, and BENTON, made a few remarks on the subject; and the resolution was negatived by a considerable majority.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. VAN BUREN rose, in pursuance of notice given on Wednesday last, to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, on the subject of the power of Congress to make roads and canals. He said he was as much opposed as any man, to frequent alterations of the form of government under which we live, but he would make no apology for bringing this matter before the Senate, in so imposing a form as that of an amendment to the Constitution. He would not do so, because he was entirely convinced that no one could dispassionately consider the present state of the question, to which his resolution relates, without feeling the imperious necessity of some Constitutional provision on the subject. It was not his intention, at this time, to enter into the discussion of the matter; he would only submit one or two general remarks in relation to it. Of the importance of the question, it was not necessary to speak. Suffice it to say, that, in its scope, it embraces the funds of the nation to an unlimited extent, and in its result must affect, as far as the agency of the Federal Government was concerned, the future internal improvement of a great and flourishing country. Is the power to make roads and canals, within the States, now vested in the Federal Government? Individuals, said Mr. V. B., may give their impressions, with their reasons for the various ingenious constructions they put upon the different parts of the Constitution, to make out that this power exists; but all candid men will admit that there are few questions more unsettled. Whilst, in some States, the power is universally conceded, and its exercise loudly required, in others, its existence is as generally denied, and its exercise as ardently resisted. Is there cause to believe that, as the Constitution now stands, a construction will obtain, which will be so far acquiesced in as to be regarded and enforced as one of the established powers of the General Government? He thought there was not. For about twenty years, this subject had been one of constant and earnest discussion. Efforts have at various times been made in Congress to exercise the power in question. They have met sometimes with more, and sometimes with less, favor. Bills, containing the assertion, and directing the exercise of this power, have passed the two Houses, and been returned, with objections, by two successive Presidents, and failed for want of the Constitutional majority. The last Congress and the Executive were arrayed against each other, upon the question, and as far as a recent vote of the other House may be regarded as evidence of the present opinion of Congress, there is every reason to believe that such is now the case.

The Government has now been in operation rising of thirty years; and although the subject has always been a matter of interest, no law clearly embracing the power has ever yet been passed. There is, therefore, but little reason to hope, that, without some Constitutional provision, the question will ever be settled. If the General Government has not now the power, Mr. V. B. said, that he for one, thought that, under suitable restrictions, they ought to have it. As to what those restrictions ought to be, there might, and probably would, be diversity of opinion. But, as to the abstract proposition, that as much of the funds of the nation as could be raised, without oppression, and as are not necessary to the discharge of existing and indispensable demands upon the Government, should be expended upon internal improvements, under restrictions regarding the sovereignty and securing the equal interest of the States, he presumed there would be little difference of opinion. He could not but hope, that those who think the better construction of the Constitution is, that Congress now have the power, would also consent to some amendment. They must, at all events, admit that it is far from being a clear, and certainly not a settled matter, and in view of the danger always attending the exercise of a doubtful right by the Federal Government against the persevering opposition of the several States, they would decide whether, instead of contesting this matter as it has been done for so many years, it would not be more for the interest of the nation, as well as the credit of the Government, to place the matter on well defined ground. There were many strong reasons why he thought this course ought to be pursued, and which, at the proper time, he would take the liberty to urge. For the present, he would simply add, that, independent of the collisions of State interests, which this power is more likely than any other to produce, the exercise of it in the present state of the Constitution, and with an Executive whose reading of it should be different from that of the present, and the two who last preceded him, could not fail to be grossly unequal among the States; because it is well known that there were some States who have invariably, and who will, as long as they prefer the inviolability of the Constitution to their local interest, continue to oppose the exercise of this power with them. Without, therefore, the ability to prevent, they would be excluded from the benefits of its exercise. The course now proposed had been earnestly recommended to the last Congress by the present Executive, and, when the subject came up for discussion, he would endeavor to show that its adoption was called for by the best interests of the nation.

Leave was then granted, and Mr. VAN BUREN offered the following resolution, which was read, and passed to a second reading:

"Resolved, &c., That the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States:

"Congress shall have power to make roads and canals; but all money appropriated for this purpose, shall be apportioned among the several States according to the last enumeration of their respective numbers, and applied to the making and repairing of roads and canals within the several States, as Congress may direct; but any State may consent to the appropriation by Congress of its quota of such appropriation in the making or repairing of roads and canals, without its own limits; no such road or canal shall, however, be made within any State, without the consent of the Legislature thereof, and all such money shall be so expended under their direction."

SLOOPS OF WAR.

The Senate then proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the building of an additional number of sloops of war for the naval service of the United States.

Mr. PARROTT said that, upon examination into this subject, he had found that the Government had, at different times, built twelve or thirteen vessels of the description proposed to be built, under this act; that this class of vessels were of the greatest use, both in peace and war; that the experience of the last year furnishes proof enough of their utility. The outrages committed by the pirates in the West Indian seas had shown the necessity of vessels of such a size as were best fitted to protect our commerce. In 1803 Congress had authorized the building of four vessels of sixteen guns, in 1804 two others were built, and in 1813 six additional vessels of the same class—making, in the whole, twelve vessels. By shipwreck, decay, and disaster, a considerable portion of these vessels were lost; and there now only remained three or four of them, and those not of the best kind. By passing this act, Congress would only restore the former number of sloops of war. The great amount of our trade to the West Indies, requiring the protection of the Government, could be protected in no better way than by this class of vessels; and when their general utility and efficiency were considered, Mr. P. hoped the bill would not be opposed. He said if the bill should pass, that probably all the vessels would not be built this year, and that the money would not be called for immediately; probably three years would elapse before the ten vessels, authorized by the bill, would be completed.

Mr. CHANDLER had no objection to this class of vessels; but he thought the Navy, both in respect to the large and the small vessels, was about to be increased beyond what the circumstances of the country require. He believed that if five vessels, of the class proposed in the bill, were built, it would be amply sufficient. He, therefore, moved to strike out the word "ten" from the bill.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs, stating it as his opinion that the economy and convenience of the service required an addition of as many as ten vessels of this class. Mr. L. made some few remarks in support of the bill. He said that the small number of navy yards on our seacoast rendered it probable that not more than five or six of the vessels would be built the present year, if the act passed in its present shape; and, consequently, that not more than $400,000 or $500,000 of the money would be wanted within the year, and that economy in building them would be promoted by this delay, as the timber could be purchased, and time allowed for it to season.

Mr. SMITH thought the Senate ought to have some regard to the finances of the country, while acting upon bills of this kind, and to recollect that this specific appropriation was over and above the annual appropriation of $500,000 for the increase of the Navy; that not only the cost of building these vessels should be taken into view, but also the annual expense of supporting them afterwards; that the great demands upon the Treasury, for the disbursement of the public debt and other purposes, should be considered. He hoped, if the bill should pass, that the building of these vessels would not be confined to those places where the navy yards were established, but that contracts would be made in other ports, in order to give their mechanics a share of the business. He concluded by moving the postponement of the bill till Tuesday next.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, did not rise for the purpose of opposing the postponement of the bill, for he was always in favor of giving time for inquiry, but he wished to raise his voice against building any public vessels by contract; he would not vote one dollar to build by contract. The pernicious effects of this mode of building had been sufficiently proved. In Great Britain public vessels built by contract had frequently rotted before they were off the stocks.

Messrs. HOLMES of Maine, LLOYD of Maryland, MACON, and LOWRIE, each made a few remarks upon the subject, and the motion to postpone, to Tuesday next, prevailed.

OFFICERS OF CONGRESS.

The Marquis De Lafayette having expressed his intention to revisit this country:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be requested to communicate to him the assurances of grateful and affectionate attachment still cherished for him by the Government and people of the United States.

And be it further resolved, That, whenever the President shall be informed of the time when the Marquis may be ready to embark, that a national ship (with suitable accommodation) be employed to bring him to the United States.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. HAYNE said, that the committee, to whom these resolutions were referred, had directed him to report them in a shape which, it is believed, will meet the wishes, and accord with the views, of every gentleman in this House. I may, said he, be permitted, individually, to indulge this hope, not only from the character of the proposition, but also from the unanimity which prevailed in the committee, composed, as it was, with the single exception of him who now addresses you, of statesmen and soldiers of the Revolution; men who have fought and bled, or suffered, in the cause of their country, and whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect.

I have seldom, said Mr. HAYNE, had a more delightful duty to perform, than that of reporting these resolutions in honor of the Marquis De Lafayette—resolutions intended to give expression to the feelings of veneration and attachment which the people of the United States have always cherished for that gallant soldier and devoted patriot.

After an absence from this country of nearly half a century, his services are still "freshly remembered," while his virtues are enshrined in every American heart. There are men still left among us, who were his companions in arms, or who, from their high stations in the public service, witnessed his exertions in the field. I behold some of them now around me, occupying seats in this Hall, and honoring, by their presence, the councils of their country; men, whose heads have indeed been bleached by the revolution of many Winters, but whose hearts time has had no power to chill. Their bosoms still swell with patriotic emotions, and the warm current of unbroken affection rushes strongly towards the friends of their youth, and their old companions in arms. Perhaps there exists no stronger tie than that which binds the patriot and soldier to those with whom he has shared common dangers, and achieved common victories. Such men, said Mr. H., will excuse me, the members of this honorable body will indulge me, while I dwell, for a few moments, on the character and services of the gallant Lafayette. We are, it is true, no strangers to his history, yet we may recall some of the incidents of his life with perfect satisfaction, as few men have ever exhibited so much purity in motive, and so much virtue in conduct.

The era of the American Revolution found the Marquis Lafayette a young man, (only nineteen years of age), in attendance at the Court of his sovereign, the King of France. A nobleman by birth, of a distinguished family, and the heir to a large fortune, he might be said, in the language of Lord Byron, to have been "bred an aristocrat." That the earliest reflections of such a man should have made him aspire to the character of the benefactor of mankind; that his very first step should have placed him by the side of patriots and heroes who were fighting the battles of freedom, establishes beyond all question that he was a man "cast in no common mould." While other noblemen of his age and standing were swelling the pomp and pageantry of power, he resisted the blandishments of the Court; closed his breast against the influence of pleasure; tore himself from his kindred and his native land, to vindicate, in America, the rights of man. It is recorded by the historians of the day, that the American Commissioners at Paris, in consequence of an unfavorable turn in the tide of our affairs, strongly dissuaded the youthful soldier from taking that decisive step, and it is positively asserted, that the French Monarch, so far from encouraging the enterprise, actually issued orders for his arrest. They were unavailing; for what obstacles are insuperable to the noble in soul—the firm in heart—the steadfast in purpose? Lafayette fitted out an expedition at his own private expense, and embarked himself and his fortunes in the cause of freedom. He arrived at Charleston early in 1777, and notwithstanding his extreme youth, was immediately appointed by Congress a Major General in the American Army. From that period to the termination of the contest, he performed, with extraordinary zeal and fidelity, all the duties incident to his exalted station, and proved himself, on all occasions, a high-minded and accomplished gentleman, a gallant soldier, and a consummate Captain. At the battle of Brandywine, he freely shed his blood in our service, and in the campaign of 1781, he was intrusted by WASHINGTON with the command of a separate army for the defence of Virginia. He fulfilled that high duty to the perfect satisfaction of the Commander-in-Chief, and to the admiration of the whole country. It is sufficient praise to say that, on that occasion, he, with a very inferior force, baffled the skill, and frustrated the plans of the "all-accomplished Cornwallis."

All who knew Lafayette during the Revolution, bear united testimony to his uncommon merit. The histories of that day are filled with instances of his gallantry and good conduct. But why multiply proofs? His best eulogy was embraced in a single sentence: WASHINGTON was his friend! Witness the letter written by his own hand while President of the United States, to the Emperor of Germany, (soliciting the release of the Marquis from the prison into which he had been thrown,) breathing in every line a brotherly affection; and in which he declares, "that his friendship for the Marquis Lafayette has been constant and sincere." WASHINGTON never forgot—he never ceased to love him; and his last will affords evidence that he cherished for him feelings which not even the prospect of death could extinguish. Lafayette did not leave our shores until he had seen us a free and independent nation: and from that moment to the present, he has claimed, as the proudest of his titles, that of an American citizen.

I will pass over the troubles in which he has been constantly involved since his return to France, with the single remark, that it will be recorded by the candid historian of this eventful age, that, amidst scenes of blood, in which unhappy France has been steeped, the hands of Lafayette were unstained; and though surrounded by temptations, before which the best hearts and best minds of Europe have fallen, he has "held fast his integrity to the end." The United States have at no period been unmindful of the debt which they owe to the Marquis Lafayette. They have recorded their gratitude, not merely by repeated votes of thanks, but by more substantial deeds; nor should it ever be forgotten, that it was an American citizen who opened the doors of his dungeon at Olmutz.

Let it not be supposed that these resolutions are superfluous, or that they add nothing to the expressions of the national gratitude. The moral effect of measures of this character is very great. They act on public opinion, (that lever by which the modern world is moved;) they purify public feeling and ennoble public sentiment, teaching the rising generation the great lessons of patriotism and of duty. Republics have been charged with ingratitude, and Europeans, ignorant of the whole structure of our Government and the course of our policy, have supposed that the charge is justified by our own example. But, when it shall, at some future period, come to be known abroad how the United States have, on all occasions, acted towards the Marquis Lafayette; when it shall be understood that, in addition to the other proofs of our gratitude, (which I am not disposed here to enumerate,) we approached him in his old age with the expressions of our affectionate attachment; it may perhaps be acknowledged that there can be no better inheritance than the gratitude of a free people.

There is another view of this subject, said Mr. H., entitled to some weight. It is the moral effect of the proposed measure on our own country. No one acquainted with the American character, can doubt that the Marquis Lafayette will meet with such a reception here as is due to the friend of WASHINGTON. He will be met by the few survivors of the Revolution, (his former companions in arms,) with the warmth of an old and tried affection; he will find in the hands of some of them the treasured memorials of his ancient friendship; he will be greeted with enthusiasm by millions of freemen. How enviable will be the feelings of that venerable man, when, in traversing this great Republic, he shall behold every where the triumph of order, peace, political and religious liberty, unexampled prosperity, and unequalled happiness? and when he shall feel, and know, and hear it every where acknowledged, that these blessings are in part the fruit of his efforts!

The Marquis Lafayette has signified his wish to visit our country. He must not be suffered to approach it as an undistinguished stranger. He must come protected by the flag under which he has so often fought, and so often conquered.

These resolutions are worthy of the National Legislature; they will find a response in every American bosom. I hope, I trust, they will pass the Senate as they have done the House of Representatives, by a unanimous vote.

The happiest moment in the life of the Marquis Lafayette was probably that when, finding that France had acknowledged the independence of the United States, he rushed into the presence of WASHINGTON, and throwing himself on the bosom of his friend, burst into a flood of patriotic tears. But, should we pass this resolution, he is destined to experience still more exalted happiness, when he shall be assured, by the unanimous vote of the American Congress, "of the grateful and affectionate attachment still cherished for him by the Government and people of the United States," and when he shall be hailed by ten millions of freemen as their benefactor.

Mr. CHANDLER expressed his assent to the resolution as reported by the select committee. It was unanimously passed to be engrossed, and read the third time; and, subsequently, had its third reading, by general consent, and passed.

TUESDAY, January 27.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary for the Department of State, prepared in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate of the first of March last, exhibiting the factories, in each State, employed in manufacturing for sale such articles as would be liable to duties if imported from foreign countries. The report was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. FINDLAY presented the memorial of James Kilton, and others, the memorial of Matthew Davis, and others; the memorial of Cyrus Jacobs, and others; the memorial of Aaron Erwin, and others; also, the memorial of John Dowlen, and others; severally praying additional duties on imported iron, and on certain manufactures thereof. The memorials were read, and severally referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. VAN BUREN presented the petition of Conrad Ten Eyck, of Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, praying indemnification for a quantity of merchandise, of which he was plundered by the Chippewa Indians, during the late war; and for which it was their intention to provide, by a supplemental article of a treaty, concluded between the said Indians and the Commissioner acting on behalf of the United States. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DICKERSON presented the petition of Elizabeth McFarland, praying relief, in consideration of the wounds received by her husband at the battle of Chippewa, and of which he has since died.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the 26th December, the memorial of Walter S. Chandler, reported a bill for the relief of Walter S. Chandler; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred, on the fifth January, the petition of Peter H. Hobart and Lewis Judson, reported a bill confirming the claim of Peter H. Hobart and Lewis Judson to a certain tract of land; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred, on the 5th instant, the petition of Charles Parent, reported a bill confirming the claim of the heirs and legal representatives of Charles Parent to two tracts of land; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. VAN BUREN, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James Hunter and John P. Williamson, presented and referred on the 30th December.

Mr. SMITH asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the gradual supply of cannon, bombs, and howitz, for the fortifications; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of the 26th instant, to instruct the Committee on Pensions to inquire into the expediency of placing James Morrow upon the pension list; and agreed thereto.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Forrest was read the second time.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt; and, on motion by Mr. MILLS, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Friday next.

The bill to alter the time of holding the district court in Mobile, in the State of Alabama, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the final adjustment of land claims in the State of Missouri, and Territory of Arkansas, under French and Spanish titles, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. After some debate, in which Messrs. BARTON, CHANDLER, KING, of New York, LOWRIE, and BENTON, took part, the bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

LAND CLAIMS IN LOUISIANA.

The following resolution, proposed yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the present register of the land office at Opelousas, Louisiana, to make, to the Secretary of the Treasury, a report of all the land claims filed in his office, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of Congress, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana," passed 11th May, 1820; and to perform such other duties in relation to said claims, as should have been performed by the former register of the said land office."

Mr. JOHNSON, in support of his resolution, remarked, that, by the act of 1820, the registers of the land offices at New Orleans, Opelousas, and Ouachita, in the State of Louisiana, were required to receive notices, in writing, of all land claims in their respective districts, which had not previously been filed and acted on, with such evidence as might be offered, with respect to them; and to make, to the Secretary of the Treasury, on the first day of January thereafter, a report of all the claims filed in pursuance of the provisions of the said act. He said, that the registers at New Orleans, and at Ouachita, faithfully performed the duties required of them by the law alluded to, and that their reports were acted upon by Congress at the last session. But he regretted that he was constrained to say, that the former register at Opelousas had grossly violated his duty, and that the people of the district had, in consequence, been subjected to great inconvenience. No report had yet been received from him; and as he was, some time since, appointed to another office, it is believed, by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the register now in office is not authorized to make the report contemplated by the act alluded to. The object of his resolution, therefore, he said, is, to obtain an act giving the necessary authority to the present register.

The resolution was then agreed to.

SLOOPS OF WAR.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill authorizing an additional number of sloops of war, for the naval service of the United States. On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, the bill was amended, by inserting the words, "as soon as suitable materials can be procured," and, also, by striking out the clause respecting the sum to be appropriated.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, rose in support of the bill. He went generally into a consideration of the merits of the bill, and gave, at length, an illustration of the usefulness and gallantry of the Navy of the United States, and of the expediency of increasing the Naval Establishment, by the addition of the ten sloops of war proposed in the bill, whether considered in reference to a due apportionment, or classification, of the naval force of the United States; as a school for the preparation of officers for higher and more important commands; and as a measure of economy, to prevent the employment of the larger vessels for the protection of our commerce, on our own coasts, in the Mediterranean, and in the Pacific; and concluded by expressing his hope, that as many of the sloops of war should be authorized to be built forthwith, as suitable materials can be provided for; and that preparation be made for building the remainder, not exceeding ten, the year ensuing.

Mr. CHANDLER was still opposed to this bill—he had no objection to an augmentation of the naval force, so far as it was necessary—but he thought it better not to build vessels faster than the service required; and that five vessels would be as many as were, at this time, necessary.

Mr. SMITH had no objection to providing that the materials for building the vessels in question, should be prepared—for he thought it highly necessary that the timber should be seasoned—and he presumed the attention of the Navy Department would be confined to the purchase of the timber only, at present. He thought it was not necessary, at this time, to go into a consideration of the services rendered by the Navy. Those who were once opposed to the Navy, had now become its friends. At one time, there had been a general antipathy towards a Navy; particularly among the persons then composing one of the great parties in the country; he, himself, had always been in favor of it. A short time before the war, the subject was brought before Congress: and a very able investigation was made. He had no doubt, at that time, but the general voice of the nation was in favor of a navy; but still an antipathy was, in some parts of the country, entertained against it. But nearly all had now become friendly to it. The late war had obviously shown the necessity of a Navy. By that war, it had been fully confirmed that, when we met on equal terms, we were fully competent to cope with any enemy, on the ocean. The battles on Lake Erie and Champlain had fully refuted all theories against a naval force. The principal part of our glory in that war, was gained upon the water. He believed the description of vessels referred to in this act was very useful—that they furnish employment for our young officers, which he considered a very important circumstance. Our seamen are always ready for service—but not so with the officers—they require practice, and knowledge of seamanship, and to be accustomed to command—these qualifications are only to be obtained in practice. In this way they are prepared to maintain the glory which the country has already obtained.

But still it is possible we may go too far in the business of increasing the Navy. It is always an indispensable duty to keep an eye on the finances of the country. Congress should not go to such expenditures on account of the Navy, as to make that unpopular, which was now popular. This consideration had induced him to make the remarks on this subject, which he made to the Senate the other day. And he felt glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts had seen fit to amend the bill, so as to take the sense of the Senate upon his view. Mr. S. said, he did not precisely agree with the honorable member, in regard to the situation of the financial concerns of the country. The probable balances in the Treasury could not always be considered as being at the disposal of Congress. When certain sums are appropriated for expenditures, they may be spent within the year; and, therefore, future balances cannot be safely calculated upon. It was stated that there would not be more than nine millions in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1825. If the law for purchasing seven per cent. stock should be taken advantage of by the holders of the stock, these purchases would require a part of that amount. The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund will have a right to demand nine millions from the Treasury. To meet all the demands, at least fifteen millions will be necessary, on the 1st January, 1825; and, to raise this sum, a loan may be necessary. If the present appropriation were reduced to one-half the amount at first proposed, he thought it probable not more than half this reduced sum would be required, during the present year; and, thus modified, he should be willing to vote for the bill.

Mr. LOWRIE said, he had not yet obtained the information to which he had alluded, when this subject was before the Senate some days since, and was not quite satisfied to vote for the bill. He wished to know what disposition was to be made of these vessels, if built. He believed those which we had already, of the same class, had been, for a considerable part of the time since the war, out of employ; and, if this were the case, it certainly could not be necessary to increase the number. If the vessels were absolutely requisite, for the good of the service, he would be willing to vote for building them; even if it was necessary to borrow money for the purpose. He thought, however, that bills of this nature, making large appropriations, ought to originate in the other House.

Mr. PARROTT made a few remarks in favor of the bill, and in confirmation of his observations, when the bill was before under consideration.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the bill was postponed to Friday next, and made the order of the day.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Isaac Kelly; and, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

KING, of New York, HOLMES, of Maine, SMITH, MILLS, MACON, BENTON, and BROWN, engaged. The bill was supported on the ground that the road contemplated is absolutely necessary to render Fort St. Philip useful as a means of defence; that fortification being at present accessible only by water, which mode of communication is found extremely inconvenient for the transportation of cannon and other munitions of war, and renders the garrison peculiarly defenceless in time of war. It was also contended that this bill, proposing the construction of a road for purposes purely and solely military, does not come within the purview of the great question of Constitutional power, on the part of Congress, to construct roads and canals. On the other hand, it was argued that, if the road were indeed for military purposes exclusively, it should be constructed by the troops of the United States, or from the proceeds of the public lands contiguous to it, without calling for appropriations from the Treasury. The bill was objected to as immediately involving the question upon the power of Congress to make roads; as, in its course, it was contemplated to pass, for a considerable distance, through lands belonging to individual citizens of the State of Louisiana; and it was thought best by some members that the consideration of it should be postponed until the question of Constitutional power should, in some shape, be decided. The bill was finally laid upon the table.

THURSDAY, January 29.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of the Territory of Florida, transmitting a copy of the laws passed at the last session of the Legislative Council of that Territory; which was read.

The bill for the relief of Hanson Kelly; the bill for the relief of the President, Directors, and Company of the Merchants' Bank of Newport, Rhode Island; the bill confirming the claim of the heirs of Nicholas Baudin and Joseph Chastang to a certain tract of land; and the bill for the relief of Samuel Wharton, were severally read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWN, from the select committee on Roads and Canals, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the laying out and opening certain public roads in the Territory of Florida," reported it without amendment.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John Michael, deceased," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Wharton," was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. KING, of New York, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, received yesterday, respecting the progress made in completing certain maps, required by a resolution of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Moses Wing, of Maine, praying an increase of pension; the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the choice of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and the election of the President and Vice President of the United States, together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee, Mr. LANMAN in the Chair; and, on motion, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The resolution reported by the select committee on the several amendments to the Constitution, which provide that no person shall be eligible to the Presidency for more than eight years, was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. LANMAN in the Chair.

Mr. DICKERSON observed that the amendment now proposed, he had the honor to offer to the Senate, near the close of the last session, in connexion with another proposed amendment, as it respected the choice of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States. It has been deemed more correct to separate these propositions, that each may be discussed on its own merits. At the last session, the amendment now under consideration underwent some discussion, and appeared to meet with no opposition from any quarter, although, for want of time, no decision was had upon it. And the committee of seven, to which it was lately submitted, were unanimously in favor of its adoption. It must appear strange that the principle of this amendment was not adopted in the original Constitution. That it was not, is owing to circumstances which it would be difficult, and perhaps not very important, to explain. In the Federal Convention, there was probably no question of more intrinsic difficulty, than that of giving to the Chief Executive that exact degree of power which the interest and safety of the country might require, without infringing upon the rigid principles of Republican Government. On this subject, the opinions of gentlemen were at opposite points. Some were for an Executive during good behavior, or for life, with extensive powers, that would have made our Government an elective monarchy. Others were for restricting his powers, according to the maxims of Roman jealousy. The course adopted was an intermediate one.

No adequate limitation being fixed as to the time or extent of the authority of the Supreme Executive, the natural tendency of our system is to increase and perpetuate power in that branch of our Government. That this result has not been practically felt, is not to be attributed to our Constitution, but to the virtues of the illustrious statesmen who have presided over the councils of this nation.

We should always be fearful of introducing new principles into our Constitution; but there is nothing new in the amendment now proposed. It is as old at least as the Constitution itself. Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, in the Convention, proposed that no person should be elected President of the United States a second time. The term of service then in contemplation was seven years. This proposition was adopted—eight States voting for it, one against it, and one divided. The proposition of Mr. Paterson, of New Jersey, contained a similar provision.

On the 6th of August, 1787, a Committee of the Convention reported a draught of a Constitution, containing this provision. This draught was re-committed, and in a month afterwards, reported as an amended draught; but this important provision, for some mysterious cause, had disappeared—and is no more to be found in the journals of the Convention.

A proposition had been submitted by a delegate from New York, that must have created a great sensation in the Convention. It was, that the Senate and Chief Executive should be elected to serve during good behavior, that is, for life. The Chief Executive to be vested with extensive powers—so as to make him an elective monarch. It is to be presumed that this plan met with but little countenance in the Convention, but the delegate from New York would not have made his proposition, without an assurance of some support.* It probably served to defeat the views of those who were anxious to limit the term of service of the Chief Executive. The plan adopted avoided both extremes—leaving one party to hope that, by some future amendment, the principle they advocated might be adopted. The other to hope that our system of Government, from its natural tendency, would in time become in substance, if not in form, an elective monarchy.

On the ratification of the Constitution by the States, several of them proposed amendments. Virginia proposed that no person should be capable of serving as President of the United States more than eight years in sixteen. North Carolina proposed the same. New York proposed that no person should be eligible a third time as President of the United States; which is precisely what is now proposed.

The illustrious example of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, of retiring to the walks of private life, after filling, for eight years, the most important office within the gift of the people, has acquired, in some degree, the force of law; and this is strengthened by all the weight of public opinion. But neither illustrious example, nor public opinion, can restrain ambition, when combined with power. They are not law, but may point out most distinctly what the law should be. And they do, in the most impressive manner, admonish us, while the danger is yet remote, to adopt the proposed amendment, as a permanent part of our Constitution.

In many of the States, their Executive can serve but for limited periods. And this regulation has been found sound in principle and safe in practice. The State Executives, thus limited, possess but little power; yet the President of the United States, with his immense patronage, is not restrained by this salutary limitation. In some parts of our Constitution, we may see traces of the jealous maxims of the ancient Republics; but in the election and power of our Chief Magistrate, where the application of such maxims was most wanted, we perceive nothing of the kind.

A candidate for the Presidency must be a native citizen, or a citizen at the adoption of the Constitution; must be thirty-five years old, and a resident within the United States fourteen years previously to the election. No further conditions are required.

A General, at the head of our armies, may be a candidate for the Presidency, and no doubt will be so, at some future period, when our army, from its numbers, shall be dangerous to our liberties.

In Rome, during the time of the Republic, two consuls were elected, each a check upon the other. They were chosen for a single year. No one could be elected before the age of forty-two. But a law, to which Rome was indebted for ages for her liberty, was this, that no one could sue for the consulship unless personally present, and in a private capacity.

Pompey suffered a law to pass, by which Julius Cæsar was permitted to sue for the consulship while absent, and at the head of a victorious and powerful army, and Cicero lent the aid of his eloquence in favor of this measure. Pompey soon discovered his error, and endeavored to counteract the effects of his rashness, but it was too late. He was overwhelmed, and the liberties of Rome forever lost.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

This period of the Roman history furnishes us with the most instructive lessons, and none more so than the profound dissimulation of Octavius Cæsar, in his insidious and successful march to monarchy. When he had subdued all his enemies, and had under his command an army that could instantly crush any resistance to his power, he professed a willingness to relinquish his authority, and restore the ancient Republic; and the honest Agrippa, to whom he was more indebted for success than to any other man, advised him to do so. But he listened with more complacency to the advice of his friend Macænas, who persuaded him that he ought to consult the advantage of the country, rather than his own repose, and that he could not lay down his power with safety to the country or to himself.

In the Senate he absolutely offered to resign his authority, modestly alleging that to govern such an Empire was a task to which the Gods alone were equal. The Senate, as he knew they would do, besought him not to relinquish the administration. He yielded to their solicitation, and consented to be considered as Prince of the Senate for ten years, and to administer the affairs of the Government with them for that period, by which time, it was presumed, peace and prosperity would be restored to the commonwealth; and this ridiculous farce of relinquishing his power was acted over and over, at the expiration of every ten years, during his long reign, and he was persuaded to retain his authority by Senators who held their lives and fortunes at his will and pleasure. Even the detested and gloomy tyrant Tiberius made a show of resigning his power, but the Senate entreated him, in the most humble manner, to accept the administration of the Government, and not reject a task to which he alone was equal. Tiberius, overcome by the importunities of all around him, yielded to their entreaties, and condescended to take upon him the labor of the Government, purely to satisfy their wishes, and not his own; adding, that he would keep it only till they should think fit to give repose to his old age. He was then fifty-six years old. He soon found an infamous repose for his old age in the island of Capræ; but he never resigned his power but with his breath. Modern history would furnish us with lessons equally impressive, were it necessary to cite them.

Although there seems to be no opposition to this resolution, yet, by some, it may be thought unnecessary; that the principle it contains is so firmly established as not to need the aid of a Constitutional provision. The illustrious example of WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON, and MADISON, has acquired the moral but not the absolute force of law—a force that will yield to the first pressure of ambition and power. Our Presidents have retired from power after holding their important offices for eight years. Their characters afford the most positive assurance that, in this, they were governed by patriotic motives—motives which would have produced the same determinations at much earlier periods of their lives, under similar circumstances. It is, however, a fact, that no one of them has retired before the age of sixty-four or sixty-five. Ambition, it is to be hoped, begins to subside at this period, and the approach of the infirmities of old age admonish us to retire from the bustle and care of public life. But suppose a young, ardent, ambitious man to be elected President, at the age of thirty-six—his eight years would expire at the age of forty-four—precisely at that period of life when he could be most useful to his country and to his friends—would he willingly follow the example of our illustrious Chief Magistrates? If he did, it would probably be by retiring, not at the expiration of eight years' service, but on his reaching the age of sixty-four or sixty-five years. He would be easily persuaded by his friends that the good of his country absolutely required that he should remain in office; and if he possessed talents to make the most of his patronage and power, he would secure his re-election as often as he should think proper. And this rule, once broken, although consecrated by the example of WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON, and MADISON, would never after have the least effect.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, thought there could be no danger in adopting an amendment like this, which goes to restrain power, whatever objection might be urged against increasing the authority of Government. At this time it was peculiarly proper to consider such a subject, when there is no danger from the want of this restraint. When we have a President, popular, young, ambitious, and with all the influence attached to his office, he might offer imaginary dangers, as an excuse for attempt at re-election. The restriction he considered a salutary one.

Mr. BARBOUR did not rise to oppose the amendment, for he thought favorably of it, but he rose to express the views which he believed were entertained by those who proposed the amendment. It would be perceived that the resolution, at present, proposed that no person, after having been twice elected President, shall be again eligible. Mr. B. made some remarks upon this restriction, and concluded by moving to amend the amendment, so as to provide that no person should be elected for more than two terms successively. This provision, he thought, would sufficiently do away the apprehension of any danger from continuity in office.

Mr. DICKERSON opposed the amendment of Mr. BARBOUR. He thought that no individual ought to be elected to the highest office of the Government, in any case, for more than two terms.

Mr. BARBOUR replied. He contended that, after one election, and a subsequent return to private life, the individual ought not to be disfranchised, and deprived of the right to be elected. He instanced the examples of the distinguished individuals, at present living, who have filled the office; living, too, as far as he could ascertain, from his intimate knowledge, of all but one of those individuals, and from having read the public writings of the other, with their mental powers unimpaired by the ravages of time. Such men, he thought, ought not to be proscribed from a re-election.

Some further debate took place between Messrs. DICKERSON, BARBOUR, and HOLMES, of Maine.

Mr. MACON said, the example of the illustrious men who had filled the office of President, clearly showed their opinions on this subject; that several of them had been solicited to take the office again, but had declined it; that all men who rendered great services to their country, would inevitably meet with the love and gratitude of the people; that there was a time in the life of men advanced in years, when they begin to fear a failure in their faculties, but, when that time has passed, they lose all doubt of their capacity and competency. For this reason there ought to be restraints in the Constitution, as to the time for which persons shall be eligible to the office of President. Mr. M. was in favor of the resolution as reported by the committee, in preference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was then taken on Mr. BARBOUR'S amendment, which was lost.

The original resolution was then reported to the Senate, without amendment, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

FRIDAY, January 30.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Claims, reported unfavorably on the petition of William W. Wilson. The report was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Indiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill for the relief of James Johnson, without amendment. The report, accompanying the bill, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of David Potts, and others, praying that additional duties be imposed on imported iron and steel, and on all manufactures thereof; he also presented the memorial of James Lambert and others, of Roger Foster and others, of John Saunderland and others, of William King and others, of John Gaunt and others, and of James McEwen and others, all of the city and county of Philadelphia, severally praying that the tariff may be so modified as to afford that protection to manufactures which is afforded to commerce. The memorials were severally read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Florida," reported it without amendment; which was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. E., from the same committee, to whom was referred, on the 29th of December last, the petition of John Forbes and Company, reported a bill, releasing a certain tract of land to the heirs and legal representatives of John Forbes; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt; and, on motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the building of an additional number of sloops of war for the naval service of the United States; and, on motion by Mr. HAYNE, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Tuesday next.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to provide "that no person, having been twice elected to the office of President, shall again be eligible to that office," was read the third time, and the question on passing the same was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Benton, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Edwards of Connecticut, Knight, and Seymour—3.

So it was resolved, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring, that this resolution pass, and that the title thereof be, a "Resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of the President of the United States."

The resolution reported by a select committee of the Senate, proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in relation to the election of President and Vice President, and of Representatives in Congress, was taken up for consideration, as in Committee of the Whole.

The question was declared to be upon a resolution proposed by Mr. BENTON, as an amendment to that reported by the select committee. Mr. B.'s amendment proposes to divide the country into districts, each district having a vote for President and Vice President, that vote to be decided by the ballots of the people, in primary assemblies, without any intermediate Electors; and in case of no choice by the people, then to be decided by the House of Representatives, as at present.

Mr. B. went into an able argument in consideration of the various other modes of election, and in support of that contained in his resolution. Before Mr. B. had concluded, the Senate, on motion of Mr. MILLS, (made in consequence of the apparent fatigue of the Speaker,) adjourned to Monday next.

MONDAY, February 2.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the security of public money in the hands of clerks of courts, attorneys, and marshals,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, of the Senate, be instructed to inquire into the present state and circumstances of the Navy Hospital Fund; and whether any, and, if any, what, further provision is necessary to carry into effect the wise and humane objects of the Government, in relation to the said fund; with leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, presented the memorial of George Hallam, and others, merchants, and underwriters, of New London, in Connecticut, praying indemnification for depredations committed on their commerce by the public and private armed vessels of France, from the year 1793 to 1800. The memorials were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of Harrison and Sterret, and others, auctioneers, of the city of Baltimore, praying that no duty may be imposed on sales by auction of British or other foreign manufactures; which was read. He also presented the memorial of William Lorman, and others, manufacturers and mechanics, of the city of Baltimore, praying an increase of duty on certain imported fabrics, and a duty of ten per cent. on foreign fabrics, when sold at auction; which was read.—The memorials were referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. S. presented the petition of Julius Willerd and Thomas Childs, representing that they have invented a gun, called "Infantillery," of great efficiency in an army as an instrument of offence or defence; and praying Congress to authorize the purchase of their patent for the use of the Government; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLS presented the memorial of William Davis, and others, of Plymouth, and of William Bartlett, and others, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, praying indemnification for depredations committed on their commerce by the public and private armed vessels of France, from the year 1793 to 1800. Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of John Greemer, and others, of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying that a duty of ten per cent. may be imposed on sales at auction; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred, on the 20th ultimo, the petition of John Pritchard, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to regulate the surveying of the public and private lands in the southern part of Alabama; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BARTON, from the same committee, to whom was referred, on the 26th December last, the petition of Andrew Henshaw, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of William Wilson; and it was postponed until tomorrow.

The bill releasing a certain tract of land to the heirs and legal representatives of John Forbes, was read the second time.

PRIVATEER PENSION FUND.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred on the 15th ultimo, by a resolution of the Senate, made a report, accompanied by a bill extending the term of pensions granted to persons disabled, and to the widows and orphans of those who have been slain, or who have died in consequence of wounds, or casualties, received while in the line of their duty on board the private armed ships of the United States, during the late war; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. It is as follows:

That, by a law of the United States, passed June 26, 1812, entitled "An act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," it was enacted that two per centum on the net amount, after deducting all charges and expenditures of the prize money arising from captured vessels and cargoes, and on the net amount of the salvage of vessels and cargoes, recaptured by the private armed vessels of the United States, shall be secured and paid over to the collector, if such captured or recaptured vessel may arrive in the United States, or to the consul or public agent of the United States, residing at the port or place not within the United States, at which such captured or recaptured vessels may arrive; and the money arising therefrom shall be held, and is hereby pledged, by the Government of the United States as a fund for the support and maintenance of such persons as may be wounded or disabled on board the private armed vessels of the United States, in any engagement with the enemy, to be assigned and distributed in such manner as may, thereafter, be by law provided; that, by a law of the United States, passed February 13, 1813, entitled "An act regulating pensions to persons on board of private armed ships," the Secretary of the Navy was required to place on the pension list, under the like regulations and restrictions as are used in relation to the Navy of the United States, any officer, seaman, or marine, who, on board any private armed ship or vessel, bearing a commission of letter of marque, shall have been wounded, or otherwise disabled in any engagement with the enemy, and to allow certain rates of pensions, therein prescribed, payable from the said fund, and from no other; which said last mentioned act was explained by an act passed August 2, 1813, entitled "An act to amend and explain the act regulating pensions to persons on board private armed vessels;" and that, by another act, passed March 3, 1814, entitled "An act giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States," pensions were authorized to be granted, for the term of five years, to the widows, and, in certain cases, the children, of those who shall die, or shall have died since June 18, 1812, by reason of a wound received in the line of their duty; which said term of five years was extended to a further term of five additional years, by an act passed April 16, 1818, entitled "An act, in addition to an act giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the private armed vessels of the United States," in which further provision was also made for the widows or children of any officer, seaman, or marine, who should have died since June 18, 1812, in consequence of an accident or casualty which occurred while in the line of his duty on board a private armed vessel of the United States.

And the committee further report that the pensions granted or continued, under the aforesaid acts of March 3, 1814, and April 16, 1818, have now expired, or are about expiring; that the fund has its origin exclusively from the retention of a property which would otherwise have belonged to the parties, or their connexions, receiving the benefit of it; that the faith or responsibility of the Government is not otherwise implicated, with regard to this fund, than that it should become its curator or guardian, from a principle of providence and benevolence, for the purpose of affording a shelter and support to those of the brave and hardy seamen of the United States, who, in time of war, may jeopard their lives in battle on the mountain wave, and thus, although in private armed vessels, promote the general interests of their country, by distressing the commerce, and by impairing the mercantile, if not naval, marine of its enemy; that the faith of the nation is not, in any degree, pledged for the sufficiency, nor for any appropriation for the maintenance of this fund; that, by a faithful administration of its concerns, and a distribution of its proceeds, as far as they will meet the objects for which they were provided, the Government will have fulfilled all its duties in relation to those who are interested in it, and that those duties will have honorably expired with the extinction of the means in which they originated.

And the committee further report that, from information obtained from the Navy Department, it appears there are, at this time, on the Privateer Pension Fund, so called, and which is the fund herein referred to, ninety-seven invalids, disabled in action in the line of their duty, and that there are also ninety-nine widows, or orphans, of persons slain or lost in private armed vessels, who now derive relief therefrom; that the aggregate annual amount of their pensions is $17,608; that the principal of the fund consists of $131,369 64 of the six per cent. funded debt of the United States, giving an annual income of $7,882 17, leaving a deficit, including expenses, of about $10,000, which has been, and must be, supplied as occasion may require, by a sale of part of the stock belonging to the fund, involving a consequent diminution thereof, and which it has, heretofore, been indispensable to make, as will more fully appear from the letter of the Secretary of the Privateer Pension Fund, bearing date January 24, 1814, accompanying this report, and which the committee request may be received and considered as part thereof, leaving, however, more than a sufficient amount to provide for, and meet a still further extension of the pensions already granted, for the term of five years, in addition to the present term allowed by law; and the committee, therefore, respectfully ask leave to bring in a bill for that purpose.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 24, 1824.

SIR: In the absence of the Secretary of the Navy, I have the honor to reply to your letter of the 22d instant, inquiring into "the present state of the Privateer Pension Fund, as regards the principal and income thereof, and the number of pensioners upon it, with the amount of their pensions;" and I beg leave respectfully to state, for the information of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, that the Privateer Pension Fund consists solely of six per cent. stock of the United States, to the amount of $131,369 64, yielding an annual income of $7,882 17. Ninety-seven invalids, disabled in action, or in the line of their duty, and the widows or children of ninety-nine persons, slain or lost in private armed vessels, derive relief from the fund, and are authorized to receive, annually, the amount of $17,608, viz: the ninety-seven disabled persons are entitled to receive $6,664, and the ninety-nine widows, or their orphans, at the rate, per annum, of $10,944.

The pensions to the persons disabled are granted during the continuance of their disability, and those to the widows or orphans for the term of ten years. The commencement of the pensions, respectively, takes place at different periods between the 18th of June, 1812, and the termination of the late war with Great Britain; and all the pensions granted to widows and orphans will expire between this and the 1st day of April, 1825. The number of invalid pensioners has been considerably diminished by death; and of the ninety-seven still retained on the list, several have not, for several years past, claimed their pensions. It is probable some of them are dead; some have recovered from the effects of the injuries they had sustained; and others are absent from the United States.

Pensions, to the annual amount of $20,568, have been granted to the widows or orphans of one hundred and ninety-seven persons, slain or lost in private armed vessels; and ninety-eight of these pensions, amounting, annually, to $9,624, have expired; some by the limitation of their term; some by death, and others by the intermarriage of the widows, without leaving children who had been under sixteen years of age at the time of their parent's decease.

The money which accrued to the Privateer Pension Fund, and by which it is constituted, arising from a deduction of two per centum on the net proceeds of prize money from captured vessels and their cargoes, and also on the salvage of vessels and cargoes recaptured by the private armed vessels of the United States, was, successively, on its receipt into the Treasury, invested in stock of the United States. The amount of stock thus acquired, was, at one time, $209,580 65; but the interest on this sum, $12,574 84, proving insufficient for the discharge of the numerous claims admitted under the different acts authorizing the issue of pensions, especially under the act approved the 16th of April, 1818, it became indispensable either to sell part of the principal, or apply to Congress for a special appropriation in aid of the fund. The former course was preferred, and stock, to the value of $87,451 30, has been sold, at various times, since June, 1819; and, to meet the semi-annual payments, which will become due on the first days of January and July, every year, further sales of the principal will be inevitable, until, at least, the whole of the pensions granted to the widows and orphans shall have been liquidated.

Should the honorable committee, of which you are chairman, desire more particular information in relation to the Privateer Pension Fund, I would respectfully refer you to a detailed report on the subject, made by the Secretary of the Navy, on the 27th of March, 1820, to the honorable the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN BOYLE,

*Sec'y Privateer Pension Fund.*Hon. JOHN LLOYD, Chairman, &c.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

In pursuance of the order of the day, the joint resolution reported by a select committee of the Senate, proposing an amendment of the Constitution, in regard to the election of President and Vice President, was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH in the Chair. The first question was upon adopting the amendment submitted by Mr. BENTON, in the shape of a new resolution, proposing a division of the country into districts; each district to have one vote for President and Vice President; that vote to be decided by the ballots of the people, in their primary assemblies; and when no election is made by the people, that the choice shall go to the House of Representatives, as now provided by the Constitution.

Mr. BENTON being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks in support of his proposition; and before he had concluded, the Senate, on motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 3.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the appropriations for the service of the year 1812, showing the amount appropriated under each specific head, the amount expended under each, and the balance remaining unexpended in the Treasury, on the 31st December, 1823.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, communicated a letter from the Navy Department, showing the annual expense of maintaining the present Naval Establishment, with information relative to a future Peace Establishment; which was read, and the letter and accompanying documents were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitteed the bill for the relief of Walter S. Chandler, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to repeal, in part, an act, entitled 'An act to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned,'" reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John Michael, deceased," reported it without amendment.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read; and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to enable the holders of French, British, and Spanish titles to lands, within that part of the State of Louisiana situate to the east of the Mississippi river and island of New Orleans, which have not been recognised as valid by the Government of the United States, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of Alfred Moore and Sterling Orgain, praying the payment of their account against the United States. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, to instruct the Committee on Naval Affairs respecting the Navy Hospital Fund; and agreed thereto.

Mr. BARTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of making further provision, by law, to prevent frauds in surveying the public lands, and in making certificates of such surveys.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the petition of John Pritchard; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved, that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

Amendment to the Constitution.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Public Lands, on the petition of Andrew Henshaw; and it was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of William Wilson; and, on motion, by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill to provide for the security of public money in the hands of clerks of courts, attorneys, and marshals, and their deputies; the bill to regulate the surveying of the public and private lands in the southern part of Alabama; the bill for the relief of Thomas F. Riddick, of the State of Missouri; the bill supplementary to "An act to perfect certain locations, and sales of the public lands, in Missouri," passed April 26, 1822; and the bill extending the term of pensions, granted to persons disabled, and to the widows and orphans of those who have been slain, or who have died in consequence of wounds, or casualties, received while in the line of their duty, on board the private armed ships of the United States, during the late war; were severally read the second time.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The order of the day, being the proposition submitted by Mr. BENTON, to amend the Constitution of the United States, in regard to the election of President and Vice President, was again taken up. Mr. BENTON resumed, and concluded his remarks on the subject, as given entire as follows:

Mr. BENTON said, he would offer no apology for attempting to amend the Constitution. It was his right, and, if sincere in his belief of its necessity, it was his duty to do so. He apprehended no evil from the multitude of amendments proposed, but thought it more probable that beneficial amendments would be rejected than that injurious propositions would be adopted. It was no easy thing now to effect an alteration in the Constitution. The difficulty of carrying an amendment through the process of ratification, presented a great obstacle, and the temper of the American people presented another, not less formidable. Though full of law-making, even to superfluity, upon subjects of ordinary policy, the people discover no disposition to make alterations in their fundamental code. On this point they seemed disposed to answer, like the old English Parliaments, when preparations were made to change the common law, "Nolumus leges anglie mutari." Applauding this sentiment, Mr. B. said, it behooved him to justify himself to the Senate for having submitted a proposition of amendment. The justification could be readily made. It would be found in the fact, that the case had occurred which the framers of the Constitution had foreseen, and for which they had provided a remedy by providing the means of amendment. These great men knew that it was one thing to lay down a plan of Government upon paper, and another to put that Government into practical operation. They knew that the theory might be perfect, and the practice vicious; that experience was the only infallible test of good or bad institutions; and, despising the arrogance of an overweening confidence in the perfection of their own work, they not only provided the means of amending the Constitution, but they relied upon this capability of amendment as one of the chief arguments in favor of the adoption of the instrument itself. Their language was, "experience must guide our labor; time must bring it to perfection; and the feeling of inconvenience must correct the mistakes into which we inevitably fall in our first trials and experiments."—(Federalist, No. 85.) In this spirit they provided a mode for reforming the Constitution, and gave the power of originating the reform both to the Federal and the State Governments, that neither might be dependent upon the other for the exercise of a power on which its own preservation might depend. In fixing upon the manner of making amendments, they flattered themselves that they had hit upon a mode equally remote from that extreme facility which would make the Constitution too mutable, and that extreme difficulty which would give perpetuity to its detected defaults. And, if they have erred in this judgment, they have erred upon the safer side; upon the side of difficulty, and not of facility, in changing the principles of our fundamental code.

The amendment submitted applies to that part of the Constitution which relates to the election of President and Vice President of the United States. Stripped of formal phrases, and minute provisions, and it presents four distinct propositions to the consideration of the Senate:

1. To divide the United States into Electoral districts.
2. To discontinue the use of intermediate Electors.
3. To commit the election to a direct vote of the people.
4. To continue the umpirage of the House of Representatives, in all cases, in which no candidate has received a majority of the whole number of votes.

The first of these propositions has often been before the Senate; the second and third are now considered new, because it is forgotten that they were offered and discussed in the Convention which framed the Constitution; and the fourth is strictly defensive, intended to sustain a part of the Constitution now in force.

Mr. BENTON proceeded to argue the propositions in the order laid down.

First: To divide the United States into Electoral districts.

We are struck with the want of uniformity in the manner of choosing Electors in different parts of the Union. Seven States, entitled to seventy Electors, choose them by districts; seven others, entitled to seventy-one Electors, choose them by a legislative ballot; and the remaining ten, entitled to one hundred and twenty, choose them by a general ticket. In the old monarchies of Europe, a want of uniformity in the operation of the Government is natural, because they are composed of conquered provinces, badly amalgamated, and each retaining a part of its former laws and customs; but, in the United States, composed of sovereignties voluntarily united, and all acting under the same clause of the same Constitution, made by themselves, such deviations are most unnatural, and imply a great fault in the Constitution itself, or in its administration by the State Legislatures. The evil of a want of uniformity in the choice of Presidential Electors, is not limited to its disfiguring effect upon the face of our Government, but goes to endanger the rights of the people, by permitting sudden alterations on the eve of an election, and to annihilate the right of the small States, by enabling the large ones to combine, and to throw all their votes into the scale of a particular candidate. These obvious evils make it certain that any uniform rule would be preferable to the present state of things. But, in fixing on one, it is the duty of statesmen to select that which is calculated to give to every portion of the Union its due share in the choice of the Chief Magistrate, and to every individual citizen a fair opportunity of voting according to his will. This would be effected by adopting the District System. It would divide every State into districts, equal to the whole number of votes to be given, and the people of each district would be governed by its own majority, and not by a majority existing in some remote part of the State. This would be agreeable to the rights of individuals: for, in entering into society, and submitting to be bound by the decision of the majority, each individual retained the right of voting for himself wherever it was practicable, and of being governed by a majority of the vicinage, and not by majorities brought from remote sections to overwhelm him with their accumulated numbers. It would be agreeable to the interests of all parts of the States; for each State may have different interests in different parts; one part may be agricultural, another manufacturing, another commercial; and it would be unjust that the strongest should govern, or that two should combine and sacrifice the third. The district system would be agreeable to the intention of our present Constitution, which, in giving to each Elector a separate vote, instead of giving to each State a consolidated vote, composed of all its Electoral suffrages, clearly intended that each mass of persons entitled to one Elector, should have the right of giving one vote, according to their own sense of their own interests.

The general ticket system, now existing in ten States, was the offspring of policy, and not of any disposition to give fair play to the will of the people. It was adopted by the leading men of those States, to enable them to consolidate the vote of the State. It would be easy to prove this by referring to facts of historical notoriety. It contributes to give power and consequence to the leaders who manage the elections, but it is a departure from the intention of the Constitution; violates the rights of the minorities, and is attended with many other evils. The intention of the Constitution is violated, because it was the intention of that instrument to give to each mass of persons, entitled to one Elector, the power of giving that Electoral vote to any candidate they preferred. The rights of minorities are violated, because a majority of one will carry the vote of the whole State. This principle is the same, whether the Elector is chosen by general ticket or by legislative ballot; a majority of one, in either case, carries the vote of the whole State. In New York, thirty-six Electors are chosen; nineteen is a majority, and the candidate receiving this majority is fairly entitled to count nineteen votes; but he counts, in reality, thirty-six; because the minority of seventeen are added to the majority. These seventeen votes belong to seventeen masses of people, of forty thousand souls each, in all six hundred and eighty thousand people, whose votes are seized upon, taken away, and presented to whom the majority pleases. Extend the calculation to the seventeen States now choosing Electors by general ticket or legislative ballot, and it will show that three millions of souls, a population equal to that which carried us through the Revolution, may have their votes taken from them in the same way. To lose their votes, is the fate of all minorities, and it is their duty to submit; but this is not a case of votes lost, but of votes taken away, added to those of the majority, and given to a person to whom the minority is opposed.

Mr. B. would be unwilling to use a harsh epithet, but he considered this case as amounting to an impressment of civil rights, more dangerous to our liberties than the impressment of our bodies by British ships of war. Free elections are the corner stones of all our institutions, and our citizens are sufficiently sensible to all attempts to destroy that freedom by violence. The violation of the right of one single vote, by a military force, would excite the indignation of the whole continent, and the disbandment of our six thousand men would not be enough to relieve us from future apprehension. Yet legislative enactments may be equally fatal, and are, in reality, more dangerous, to the United States, because less dreaded.

A further mischief of the general ticket system is, in segregating the States, drawing them up against one another, like hostile ships in battle. Out of this system has sprung the anti-social words of modern invention—"effective votes," "operative votes"—as if the States were contending with Turks or Russians. This alienates the States from each other, and fills them with hostile feelings, and the President elected must become the President of the States which choose him, and look with coldness and resentment upon those which opposed him.

The choice of Electors by legislative ballot is subject to all the objections which apply to the general ticket system, and to others of the gravest kind. In the first place, it seems to me to be a direct infraction of the Constitution of the United States, and an open usurpation of the rights of the people.

The words of the Constitution are: "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of Electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and 'Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress,' &c.

The analysis of this clause shows that two powers are required to act: first, the Legislature, which is to direct the manner; and, secondly, the State, which is to appoint the Electors.

Are the words "State" and "Legislature" synonymous?

The word State is a comprehensive term. It takes in all sorts and sizes of government, but always requires three constituent principles, to wit: people, territory, and sovereignty. In the Constitution of the United States, it has a precise meaning, too obvious to be insisted upon here. It is never confounded with the words "Convention" or "Legislature." When the "State" is to do a thing, the people of the State are to do it, and a legislative body is not competent to act, because it is not the State, but a department of it. The constitutions of all the States declare the legislative body to be a department only. Whenever the Constitution of the United States intended the Legislatures of the States to do an act, independent of the people, it has expressed its intention in terms wholly unequivocal, as in the appointment of Senators in Congress—"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years," &c. In the mode of ratifying amendments to the Constitution, the distinctions are again explicit: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, &c., which shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof." It would be absurd to admit the Legislature to be the State, for, in that case, there would be no State when the Legislature was not in session. Certainly, it seems to be a loss of time to employ words upon a difference so palpable; but it is necessary to mark it; for the question now to be decided turns upon the distinction between the appointing power of the State, and the directorial power of the Legislature, over the forms of the election.

No argument in favor of this legislative pretension can be bottomed on the word "appoint." Literally, it may refer to the act of any number. In common parlance, it refers to the act of an individual, and that individual a superior, as "the King appoints his Ministers." In the Constitution, it is used synonymously with elect and choose. It is so used in an after clause of this same article, and in reference to this identical appointment of Electors—"Congress may determine the time of choosing the Electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes," &c. In fine, the word "appoint" was evidently used to avoid that figure of speech which the rhetoricians call tautophony, that ungraceful repetition of sound which would be produced by saying "elect Electors."

The word "manner" can imply nothing but form—as the mode of conducting the election, taking the votes, certifying the returns, &c.

The word "direct," is less susceptible of misconstruction than any one in the clause; and, above all others, has been farthest deviated from. It always implies an address to a third party, and never to one's self. It is incapable of being so used. A man may regulate his own conduct, but he directs that of others. A parent directs his child; a tutor directs his pupil; a General directs the operations of his army; a legislative body may direct the people how to go through the forms of an election; but a man cannot direct himself; a legislative body cannot direct itself. There is not a book in the English language which uses the word in this sense; not one, from the little primer, that comes to us in company with the birchen rod, up to the ponderous folio of Johnson. No man acquainted with the power of language would so use it; much less the eminent men who framed the Constitution with so much ability, both as scholars and statesmen, and with such scrupulous regard to the precise meaning of every word admitted into that important instrument. But the Legislatures of seven States have so used it, and the question is, not whether they are right or wrong, but whether they have the right to alter the fixed meaning of a plain English word, for the purpose of investing themselves with a power which the Constitution had given to the people of the States?

Mr. B. asserted the obvious meaning of the clause to be the same as if it had been conceived in the following words: "The people of each State shall elect, in such form as the Legislature thereof may prescribe, a number of Electors, equal," &c. Instead of which, the Legislatures referred to had practised under it as if written: "The Legislature of each State shall elect, in such manner as they and each of them shall severally please, a number of Electors, equal," &c.

Thus, upon the words of the Constitution, it is clear that the people of the States, and not the Legislatures of the States, have the right to choose Electors of President and Vice President.

The construction put upon the Constitution, at the time of its adoption, proves the same thing.

Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention, said, "The people choose the Electors."

The Federalist says the same thing, in twenty places. No. 68 repeats it four times. It describes the Electors as "men chosen by the people, for the special purpose" of choosing the President. It describes them as "a small number of persons selected by their fellow-citizens from the general mass." It says, the Constitution has "referred the election of the President, in the first instance, to an immediate act of the people of America, to be exerted in the choice of persons for the temporary and sole purpose of making the appointment." And it speaks again of the Electors as "a special body of representatives, deputed by the society for the single purpose of making the important choice."

To this list of authorities may be added the Legislatures of seventeen States, which have prescribed the forms of choosing Electors, and left it to the people themselves to make the choice.

Having quoted these constructions of the Constitution to prevent misapprehension, Mr. J. would give his opinion upon the effect which they should have upon the decision of the Senate.

He did not admit that any Senator, or any other officer whose duty it became to expound the Constitution, was bound by a previous construction. He did not admit that they were in the condition of judges, construing a statute, and tied down by respect to their brothers, and the practice of a thousand years, to obey the previous decisions in analogous cases. Their duty depended upon a peculiar obligation to be found in the Constitution itself. All legislators have been anxious to perpetuate their work, and all have had recourse to the security of oaths. Lycurgus swore the Spartans to maintain his laws until his return; then went abroad, died, and had his ashes scattered in the air. The framers of the American Constitution invoked the aid of the same security, but without limitation of time or circumstance. In Article 6 they have required that—

"The Senators and Representatives in Congress, the members of the several State Legislatures, and all Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution."

Upon this oath, each person intrusted with the great duty of expounding the Constitution, is bound to go back to the words of the instrument itself, whenever a question of construction arises. He may and ought to consult the opinions of others, in order to enlighten his own. He may quote the opinions of others to give greater weight to his own; but he cannot surrender his own in favor of another, which he believes to be wrong, without disregarding the obligation by which he has bound himself to support this Constitution.

The reasons which induced the Convention of 1787 to institute an intermediate body of Electors, the attributes which they were to possess, and the dangers from which they were to be free, will equally show that legislative bodies were not intended to choose the Electors, much less to erect themselves into Electoral colleges. These reasons, attributes, and apprehended dangers, will be found stated in the Federalist, No. 68, but, for the sake of brevity and perspicuity, will be presented to the Senate under the heads to which they belong:

1. The Electors are to be chosen within thirty-four days before the first Wednesday in December.
2. They are to be chosen for the sole purpose of electing the President and Vice President.
3. They are to meet on the same day throughout the Union.
4. They are to sit but one day.
5. The Electoral colleges are not to be subject to caballing.
6. They are not to be pre-existing bodies.

In bringing the legislative bodies to the test of these reasons and attributes, they will not only be considered in their apparent capacity of electors of Electors, but in their real character of Electors of the President of the United States.

First. The Electors are to be chosen within thirty-four days before the day of electing the President.

The reason for fixing an interval so short is sufficiently obvious. In the first place, it delays the choice of Electors until there is full time for all the Presidential candidates to be known. In the second place, it allows no time for combinations to be formed between the Electors of different States, or for the Electors themselves to be bribed or intrigued with. Yet the members of the Legislatures, in the seven States referred to, are elected, one, two, three, and even four years before the day of electing the President. None of them are chosen for a shorter time than one year, most of them for two, and the Senators of several are chosen for four years! The whole of them are obnoxious to the objections against which the Constitution intended to guard. There is ample time for intrigue, for corruption, and for combinations. The voice of the people has but an indirect operation when the members of the Legislature are chosen one year before, and none when they are chosen two, three, or four; for, at that time, the names of the candidates are unknown, and the Presidential election unthought of by the body of the people.

Secondly. The Electors are to be chosen for the sole purpose of electing a President and Vice President.

The reason of this qualification needs no illustration. It was clearly intended to close the door against the possibility of bartering votes by giving to the Electors but one single subject to vote upon. How will the legislative bodies stand the test of this reason? When chosen within some months, or a year, before the time of electing the President, they are chosen partly for that purpose and partly for many other purposes. Some knowing ones, some furious partisans, and some equally furious enemies, may surrender all considerations for the single object of getting in a man who will be for or against a particular candidate for the Presidency; but with the body of the people, the legislative duties will be the first consideration, and the Presidential election, nothing but an ingredient, mixing itself in different proportions in the main inquiry. This is the best aspect of the question, and must be confined to elections which take place within some months, or within a year before the President is chosen. To those which come on two, three, or four years before, the Presidential election is entirely out of view. So far from being chosen for the sole purpose, the members of the Legislature are not even thought of for the purpose of electing the President. Strong as this case is, there is still a more flagrant point of view in which to exhibit it. It is the case of a legislative body, elected purely for legislative purposes, and afterwards repealing the laws which directed the people how to go through the forms of the election, and seizing into their own hands the whole power of appointing the Electors. This is not an imaginary case. It has repeatedly hap-opened. It is sufficient to name one instance; that of New Jersey, in the year 1812, in which the Legislature thus invested itself with the power of appointing Electors about three days before the people would have exercised it. When met in the Legislature, innumerable are the opportunities and temptations to barter votes. Judges, generals, governors, and many other State officers are to be elected. Towns are to be laid off, peradventure on some member's land. New counties are to be erected for the benefit of a clerk, a sheriff, and a colonel; peradventure, also, members at the time. Many other local interests are to be accommodated. The members interested in all these domestic questions, are laid under violent temptations to exchange votes with the friends of a Presidential candidate.

Thirdly. The Electors are to meet on the same day, throughout the Union, and to vote for President and Vice President.

The Legislatures meet on the days fixed by the State constitutions, or on the days which they themselves fix by law. In neither case are they governed by the Constitution of the United States. When met, the Legislature, at any time that it pleases, enters upon the business of choosing a President; and, when the choice is made, a farce is got up to appease the manes of the Constitution. Nominal Electors are chosen, and sent to the place where the votes of the State are to be counted. Instead of going to vote for President, they carry the votes in their pockets, the same which they have received from the legislative body. These votes are shown and counted, and the form of an election is gone through, but no more of the substance than there is of a wedding in the annual marriage of the Doge of Venice with the Adriatic Sea. The real election was held weeks or months before, when the legislative body selected their candidate; and the nominal Electors are nothing but messengers, trusted to bring the votes to the place of counting, and without any more power over them than the messenger afterwards employed by themselves to take up these same legislative votes, and bring them on to the Seat of Government.

Fourthly. The Electoral Colleges are to sit but one day.

The reason for limiting the Electors to this transient existence, was to prevent the possibility of intrigues and corrupt practices, by denying the time that would be necessary to carry them into effect. But the sittings of the legislative bodies are not under the control of this limitation. They sit as long as they please—usually several months—and, during all that time, it is beset, like a besieged fortress, by armies of intriguers; cannonaded with books and with pamphlets; bombarded with newspapers; perforated with the rifle shot of private and confidential letters; and undermined by the silent operations of sappers and miners.

Fifthly. The Electoral Colleges were not to be subject to caballing.

The framers of the Constitution sought to protect the Presidential election from the influence of that occult management which is the bane of republican councils. They thought they had succeeded when they instituted Colleges of Electors, composed of few persons, selected for their elevated character; brought together suddenly; confined to the discharge of one single duty, and dispersed in the short space of twenty-four hours. But legislative bodies are the reverse of all this. They are the true field for caballing; the theatre adapted to the talents of such men as the five Cabinet Ministers of Charles the Second; to the initials of whose names, combined with their characters, the world is indebted for the political signification of the Hebrew word cabal. The Legislature of Pennsylvania afforded a signal example in the year 1800. The two Houses differed in the choice of President. They would neither pass a law to direct the people how to hold the election, nor would they vote together. There was a majority of "two" in the Senate, and this lean majority, in the leanest branch of the Legislature, paralyzed the power of the State, and forced a compromise with the other branch, by which the elective power of the people, like the spoil of a vanquished enemy, was divided between themselves, each naming one-half the Electors!

Sixthly. The Electoral Colleges were not pre-existing bodies.

For the obvious reason that they might not be tampered with, beforehand, to prostitute their votes. Yet, the legislative bodies are pre-existent, to the extent of one, two, three, and even four years; and, during all this time, are subject to the danger from which it was the intention of the Constitution that the Electors of the President should be free.

Upon each of these reasons the legislative pretension to choose Electors is condemned. But there is one more argument to be brought against them; an argument not invented, but found; not taken from the head, but drawn from the page of American history; from the Journal of the Convention of 1787, from the act of the great men who framed the Constitution. An argument of that conclusive nature which only requires to be stated to silence opposition.

[Here Mr. B. read from the Journal of the Convention, pages 92, 190, 324, 333, to show that it was proposed, at one time, to have Electors chosen by the Congress; at another to have them appointed by the Governors of the States; at another, to vest the power of choosing them in the Legislatures of the different States; that this latter proposition was actually adopted at one time, on the 19th of July, and remained in the plan of the Constitution until the 6th day of September following, when it was struck out by a vote of nine States against two. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia, in favor of striking out; North and South Carolina in favor of retaining the clause.]

Mr. B. believed that all attempts to amplify such an argument as this, would only weaken it. He had tried the legislative pretension by the words of the Constitution; by its contemporaneous construction; by all the reasons which led to the institution of Electoral Colleges, and by the vote of the Convention passing upon the identical point in question; and, upon every trial, the pretension was condemned, and stood before the Senate as a direct infraction of the Constitution, and an open usurpation of the rights of the people.

Nothing has been said to justify it. On the contrary, the excuses and apologies for the general ticket and legislative systems, have turned upon the admission of their impropriety. The Senator from New York, (Mr. VAN BUREN,) in that spirit of amity, concession, and mutual deference, which cannot be too much admired, has even proposed to surrender both these systems, upon condition, nevertheless, that the small States should surrender their right to an eventual vote for President, by States, in the House of Representatives. He has called this a compromise, and has certainly urged it upon the Senate with unaffected and becoming seriousness. But the proposition cannot be met. The terms are not equivalent. On the part of the great States, it is proposed to relinquish a power, usurped from the people, in violation of the Constitution; on the part of the small States, it is proposed to surrender a Constitutional right: the one growing out of ambition and schemes of domination; the other granted to the small States for the preservation and security of their rights. Others place the apology upon different grounds. They run over a list of the States which have adopted these modes, and then say, they must adopt the same, by way of self-defence, and that they will discontinue it when the rest will do so. Thus, these States take the attitude of Cæsar and Pompey, each declining to disband his army first. They prefer to violate the Constitution, and to outrage the rights of the people, rather than be the first to set an example of justice and moderation.

Two questions, of great delicacy, now present themselves:

1. If Electors are not appointed according to the Constitution, can their votes be counted?
2. If objected to, who shall judge them?

It is the duty of the two Houses of Congress to count the votes. Can they count unconstitutional votes? If they cannot, shall they not judge every vote before it is counted?

Mr. B. would not debate these questions. He hoped that the time might never arrive when it should be necessary to debate, much less to decide them. The country had seen the agitation of 1800, and the still greater agitation of 1820; yet these were nothing but gentle breezes, dead calms, compared to what might be expected if Congress should sit in judgment upon the votes of seven States. Yet, if it shall become their duty, shall they hesitate? Shall they flinch from the defence of the Constitution which they have sworn to defend, because seven States may stand ready to light up the flames of civil war, if not permitted to violate that sacred instrument according to their own will and pleasure? He spoke hypothetically, and with all the respect for the States referred to, which was compatible with the undissembled expression of his own opinion. It was not his intention to start a new discussion, or to excite feeling, but to have the advantage of a new and powerful consideration in favor of the district system—in favor of some uniform mode of choosing the President; and thus bringing back these States to the path of the Constitution, by the gentle means of an amendment, pointing at no one in particular, and bearing upon all alike.

Mr. B. proceeded to argue the SECOND PROPOSITION, which he had submitted to the consideration of the Senate, to wit: to discontinue the use of an intermediate body of Electors in the choice of President and Vice President of the United States. He read from the Federalist, No. 68, to show the views with which Electors were instituted:

“It was equally desirable that the immediate election should be made by men most capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station, and acting under circumstances most favorable to deliberation, and to a judicious combination of all the reasons and inducements that were proper to govern their choice. A small number of persons, selected by their fellow-citizens from the general mass, will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite in so complicated an investigation.”

By the Constitution it was intended that the electoral office should be one of the first dignity in the Republic. The Electors were to be selected; men, chosen by the people on account of their superior virtue and intelligence, and left to make choice of a President, according to their own enlightened understandings, without the slightest control from the less informed multitude. This was the intention, but the plan has wholly failed in the execution. The Electors are not independent; they have no superior intelligence; they are not left to their own judgment in the choice of President; they are not above the control of the people; on the contrary, every Elector is pledged, before he is chosen, to give his vote according to the will of those who choose him. He is nothing but an agent, tied down to the execution of a precise trust. Every reason which induced the Convention to institute Electors has failed. They are no longer of any use, and may be dangerous to the liberties of the people. They are not useful, because they have no power over their own vote, and because the people can vote for a President as easily as they can vote for an Elector. They are dangerous to the liberties of the people, because, in the first place, they introduce extraneous considerations into the election of President; and, in the second place, they may sell the vote which is intrusted to their keeping. They introduce extraneous considerations, by bringing their own character and their own exertions into the Presidential canvass. Every one sees this. Candidates for Electors are now selected, not for the reasons mentioned in the Federalist, but for their devotion to a particular party; for their popular manners, and their talent at electioneering.

The Elector may betray the liberties of the people, by selling his vote. The operation is easy, because he votes by ballot; detection is impossible, because he does not sign his vote; the restraint is nothing but his own conscience, for there is no legal punishment for his breach of trust. If a swindler defrauds you out of a few dollars in property or money, he is whipped and pilloried, and rendered infamous in the eye of the law; but, if an Elector should defraud forty thousand people out of their vote, there is no remedy but to abuse him in the newspapers, where the best men in the country may be abused, as much as Benedict Arnold or Judas Iscariot. Every reason for instituting Electors has failed, and every consideration of prudence requires them to be discontinued. They are nothing but agents, in a case which requires no agent; and no prudent man would, or ought, to employ an agent to take care of his money, his property, or his liberty, when he is equally capable to take care of them himself.

But, if the plan of the Constitution had not failed—if we were now deriving from Electors all the advantages expected from their institution—I, for one, said Mr. B., would still be in favor of getting rid of them. I should esteem the incorruptibility of the people, their disinterested desire to get the best man for President, to be more than a counterpoise to all the advantages which might be derived from the superior intelligence of a more enlightened, but smaller, and, therefore, more corruptible body. I should be opposed to the intervention of Electors, because the double process of electing a man to elect a man, would paralyze the spirit of the people, and destroy the life of the election itself. Doubtless this machinery was introduced into our Constitution for the purpose of softening the action of the democratic element; but it also softens the interest of the people in the result of the election itself. It places them at too great a distance from their first servant. It interposes a body of men between the people and the object of their choice, and gives a false direction to the gratitude of the President elected. He feels himself indebted to the Electors, who collected the votes of the people, and not to the people, who gave their votes to the Electors. It enables a few men to govern many, and, in time, it will transfer the whole power of the election into the hands of a few, leaving to the people the humble occupation of confirming what has been done by superior authority.

Mr. B. referred to historical examples, to prove the correctness of his opinion.

He mentioned the Constitution of the French Republic, of the year III, of French liberty. The people to choose Electors; these to choose the Councils of Five Hundred, and of Ancients; and these, by a further process of filtration, to choose the Five Directors. The effect was, that the people had no concern in the election of their Chief Magistrates, and felt no interest in their fate. They saw them enter and expel each other from the political theatre, with the same indifference with which they would see the entrance and the exit of so many players on a stage. It was the same thing in all the subaltern Republics of which the French armies were delivered, while overturning the thrones of Europe. The constitutions of the Ligurian, Cisalpine, and Parthenopean Republics, were all duplicates of the mother institution, at Paris; and all shared the same fate. The French consular constitution, of the year VIII, (the last year of French liberty,) preserved all the vices of the Electoral system; and from this fact, alone, that profound observer, Neckar, from the bosom of his retreat, in the midst of the Alps, predicted and proclaimed the death of liberty in France. He wrote a book to prove that, "Liberty would be ruined by providing any kind of Substitute for Popular Elections," and the result verified his prediction, in four years. But the strangest of all arguments against the use of Electors, the fact which goes farther than all others to prove them to be dangerous to the rights of the people, is, that they are continued in France, at this time, under the charter of Louis XVIII. The people choose Electors, as under the constitutions of the years III and VIII; and these Electors choose the deputies to the legislative body. Heretofore, the Court party contented itself with a majority, but the signs of liberty shown by the minority, in opposing the Spanish war, has determined it to have the entire body devoted to the Crown; and the last advices inform us, that the Chamber would be dissolved to make room for this change, which would be openly effected by bribing the Electors.

Mr. B. regretted that the young Republic of Colombia had adopted the Electoral system, both in the choice of representatives in the Cortes, and in the election of the Supreme Executive. Doubtless they proceeded upon the idea, that the people were not sufficiently enlightened for the practice of self-government; but the body of the people are always sincerely devoted to the interest of their country, and their honest mistakes are less dangerous to liberty than may be the artful designs of a small and select body.

He referred to the era of the adoption of the American Constitution, to show, that many enlightened statesmen were then opposed to the use of Electors. From the debates in the Virginia Convention, he read several passages from speeches delivered by Mr. Monroe; among others, the following:

"He (the President) is to be elected in a manner perfectly dissatisfactory to my mind. I believe that he will owe his election, in fact, to the State Governments, and not to the people at large." "A combination among the Electors might easily happen, which would fix on a man every way improper. Contemplate this in all its consequences. Foreign nations, by their intrigues, may have great influence, in each State, in the election of President. Will not the influence of the President himself have great weight on his re-election? The variety of the offices at his disposal, will acquire him the favor and attachment of those who aspire after them, and of their friends. He will have some connexion with the members of the different branches of the Government. They will esteem him, be'cause they will be acquainted with him, live in the same town, and often dine with him. This familiar and frequent intercourse will secure him great influence. I presume, when once he is elected, he may be re-elected forever."

THIRD PROPOSITION: To commit the election of President to a direct vote of the American people.

This is not a new project. It was presented and discussed in the Convention of 1787, was twice put to the vote, and supported by the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware, then represented by some of the ablest men that any age or country has produced. These representatives were—

For Pennsylvania—

Benjamin Franklin,
Thomas Mifflin,
Robert Morris,
George Clymer,
Thomas Fitzsimmons,
Jared Ingersoll,
James Wilson, and Gouverneur Morris.

For Delaware—

George Read,
Gunning Bedford,
John Dickinson,
Richard Basset, and Jacob Broom.

Mr. B. took a pride in reviving the proposition of these great men. He felt himself treading upon safe ground, when he could say to the American people, "I am endeavoring to carry into effect the plan of Benjamin Franklin, and of the eminent statesmen whose names have been just read." And, instead of being called upon for an argument in support of a plan so congenial to the principles of our Government, he would suppose that the American people would call for the reasons which prevented its adoption when first proposed. These reasons will be found in the Federalist, in No. 68, and reduce themselves to objections growing out of—

1. The extent of the country;
2. The difference of population;
3. Danger of foreign interference;
4. Danger of corruption;
5. Want of intelligence in the people;
6. Danger of tumults and popular commotions.

Without inquiring into the validity of these objections, at the time that they were urged, it will be sufficient to consider them now, and to show that, with the experience which has been acquired since the adoption of the Constitution, and in the present condition of America, there is not one of them which does not admit of a prompt and satisfactory answer.

First. The extent of the country. This objection would be fatal, if the American citizens, like the Romans, were called from all parts of the Republic to vote at the Seat of Government. But they will continue to vote where they now do, in their respective counties, wards, and townships; the time only will be fixed by Congress to make the day of the election the same throughout the Union; but all the forms will be regulated by the State Legislatures.

Second. Difference of population. This objection would be fatal if the votes were to be consolidated in one general return. In that case the slaveholding States would lose the three votes in five which they now give for their black population. Doubtless it would be well for them if they could lose them by getting rid of their black population. The race of whites would take their place, and five would count five, instead of counting three, as it now does. It is the peculiar misfortune of those States that, to all the evils incident to the possession of slaves, is superadded a loss of political weight by this method of counting five persons for three. But the objection would be equally fatal if all the States were non-slaveholding. The qualifications of voters differ in each. In some the right of suffrage is universal; in others it is limited to those who have paid a tax; in others to those who hold a house, or possess real estate; and in all a residence of greater or less duration is required. In each of these the same mass of population would give different numbers of votes. But this objection is avoided, and the relative weight of the States is preserved, precisely as fixed by the Constitution. Instead of a consolidated vote, the election will be decided by districts. Each district will give one vote, as it now chooses one Elector; and the candidate preferred in the district will be entitled to that vote. To the result, it will be wholly immaterial whether the district containing a given number of souls, say 40,000, shall contain one thousand or seven thousand persons, entitled to vote for members in the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. It is to persons thus entitled that the privilege of voting for President is proposed to be extended; and it will depend upon the State constitutions, not upon Congress, or the Federal Constitution, to restrain or enlarge this privilege.

Third. Danger of foreign interference. That there is reason to apprehend such interference is readily admitted. The histories of all elective Governments are full of examples. Our own contains one instance of open and avowed interference, that of Genet's proclamation, in the year 1795. But it is denied that the people are most subject to be influenced by this interference. By what means do foreign nations interfere in elections? First, by troops; secondly, by money. Our local position frees us from apprehension of the first; and, as for money, it must come through the hands of the diplomatic corps; and must be distributed to the persons with whom they congregate. Who are these? American farmers? No. Foreign Ministers are not seen in the interior of the States, at the houses of the farmers, offering gold for votes; and, if they should ever attempt it, they would find many to answer, with the incorruptible George Reed, "The King, your master, is not rich enough to buy me;" and not a few whose answer would stop forever the advance of the Minister. No, sir, foreign agents go to small bodies of men; to a Polish diet; to a Germanic college; to a conclave of holy cardinals; and we know how they go. In the time of Francis and Charles, they went to the German Electors, followed by long trains of mules, packed with bags of gold and silver; but, since the introduction of bills of exchange, the company of the long-eared animals is dispensed with. A scrip of paper is equally efficacious, and avoids the scandal of a public display. If foreign gold shall ever be brought to influence our elections, it will go to the Electors, or to the legislative bodies, which have usurped the power of choosing the President, and not to the people at large. We have seen the time when tens of millions would have been given by either of the great belligerents of Europe to have elevated a man to the Presidency who would have involved the Republic in the war, as one of their allies; and these times may be seen again, when the virtue of public men shall be less stern than it has been. The authors of the Federalist were unfortunate; they were absolutely unlucky in the application of this objection. It is an argument for, instead of against the people, and recoils with overwhelming force upon a small body of Electors.

Fourth. Danger of corrupting the people. This objection is taken from the history of small States, composed of one or two cities; or, from the history of great ones, where the political power resided in the inhabitants of the capital. But, examples thus derived, have no application to the state and condition of the American people. What would be the means of corruption in the United States? They have already been exhibited in the speech of our present Chief Magistrate, delivered in the Virginia Convention, in the year 1788, and quoted in the beginning of this argument. Offices, loans, contracts, and entertainments, constitute those means. Apply them to the people. Of offices, there would not be one for a thousand; of loans, not one in an hundred thousand would have any money to lend on terms, either good or bad; of contracts, there would not be ten in the thousand who would want them, nor one in the thousand who could get them. The great extent of the Republic, and the dispersed situation of the inhabitants, would render it impossible to entertain them en masse, as Cæsar did the Roman citizens upon his return from Gaul. The twenty-two thousand tables, spread by that conqueror, for the dregs of a degenerate city, could not be stretched from Maine to Florida, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. But, change the direction of these engines of corruption. Address the offices, loans, contracts, and dinners, to a College of Electors! Do you see this book? said Mr. B., (holding up an octavo volume bound in blue and gold.) It is the brother to this, (holding up another much less,) and two years younger, but, contrary to the laws of nature, the younger is one fourth the largest. These books are compiled under a resolution of Congress, and directed to be laid upon our tables on the first day of January of each new Congress. The one which was due on the first day of January last, has not yet appeared. I was anxious to have had it, and to have compared it to its elder brethren, for I am much mistaken if the new born infant, from the moment of its birth, will not exceed all his family in size, and that the increase will be the same, in each succeeding member of the family, until, in form and dimensions, a monster shall be produced. This book, the last that has appeared, came forth on the 1st day of January, 1822.

It contains two hundred and-fifty seven pages, every page contains forty names, every name fills an office, and every office draws an annual salary out of the public Treasury, varying in all degrees from nine thousand dollars down to a unit. The whole is in the gift of the Executive. It is the book of Executive patronage, the Blue Book of the Republic, the Red and Gold Book of the monarchies of Europe. But this book cannot corrupt the people. The ten thousand offices it contains, could effect nothing among ten millions of people. Nine millions nine hundred thousand would remain without offices, and uncorrupted. But apply it to an Electoral college of two hundred and sixty-one members, or to a small Legislative body, and there would be places, by dozens, for themselves and their friends. The virtue and simplicity of this day must pass away. The time will come, when political power will be bought, and when the money of the people will be taken to pay the price. The time will come, when the wifeless and childless bachelor shall not look out for a successor to his estate, with more anxious solicitude than the incumbent President shall look out for a successor to his Presidential power. The time will come, when the American President, like the Roman Emperors, will select his successor, take him by the hand, exhibit him to the people, place him upon the heights and eminences in the Republic, display him in every amiable, every attractive point of view, make him the channel of all favor, and draw the whole tribe of parasites and office hunters to the feet of the favorite. We know it is written, that more nations worship the rising than the setting sun; but, let the two suns appear above the horizon at once; let their rays be drawn to a focus upon an Electoral college or Legislative assembly; yes, let their concentrated rays fall at once upon the double ranks of their united worshippers; let two Blue Books be displayed at once, the actual President paying down his ten thousand offices, and the heir apparent giving his note for ten thousand more, due and payable on the fourth day of March then next ensuing! What virtue could stand such trials? The effect must be overwhelming upon a small body of two or three hundred Electors; but all these temptations would become insignificant when scattered and dispersed among the millions of people which fill the Republic. The candidate for their favor could derive no benefit from his long list of offices. He must come, with a list, not of offices to be given, but of services performed, in the field or the cabinet. He must come, like the elder Cato, to reform the manners of a degenerate age, by an example of simplicity and economy in his own person—like Appius Claudius, to improve and adorn the interior of his country—like Cicero, to crush conspirators by the thunder of his eloquence—like Scipio, to expunge the rival nation from the face of the earth—like Marius, scarred with innumerable wounds, received from the public enemy—he must come, like our own great Washington, not to pillage his country, but to serve her, and to retire from her service, through the portals of everlasting fame.

Mr. B. took up the Fifth objection.—Want of sufficient intelligence in the people to enable them to make a judicious choice of President.

He said, this objection had a weight in the year 1787, to which it is not entitled in the year 1824. Our Government was then young, schools and colleges were scarce, political science was then confined to few, and the means of diffusing intelligence, were both inadequate and uncertain. The experiment of a popular government was just beginning; the people had been just released from subjection to an hereditary King, and were not yet practised in the art of choosing a temporary chief for themselves. But, thirty-six years have reversed this picture. Thirty-six years, which have produced so many wonderful changes in America, have accomplished the work of many centuries upon the intelligence of its inhabitants. Within that period, schools, colleges, and universities, have multiplied to an amazing extent. The means of diffusing intelligence have been wonderfully augmented by the establishment of six hundred newspapers, and upwards of five thousand post offices. The whole course of an American's life, civil, social, and religious, has become one continued scene of intellectual and of moral improvement. Once in every week, more than eleven thousand men, eminent for learning and for piety, perform the double task of amending the hearts, and enlightening the understandings, of more than eleven thousand congregations of people. Under the benign influence of a free Government, both our public institutions and private pursuits, our juries, elections, courts of justice, the liberal professions, and the mechanic arts, have each become a school of political science and of mental improvement. The Federal Legislature, in the annual message of the President, in reports from heads of Departments, and committees of Congress, and speeches of members, pours forth a flood of intelligence which carries its waves to the remotest confines of the Republic. In the different States, twenty-four State Executives, and State Legislatures, are annually repeating the same process within a more limited sphere. The habit of universal travelling, and the practice of universal interchange of thought, are continually circulating the intelligence of the country, and augmenting its mass. The face of our country itself, its vast extent, its grand and varied features, contribute to expand the human intellect and to magnify its power. Less than half a century of the enjoyment of liberty has given practical evidence of the great moral truth, that, under a free Government, the power of the intellect is the only power which rules the affairs of men; and virtue and intelligence the only durable passports to honor and preferment. The conviction of this great truth has created an universal taste for learning and for reading, and has convinced every parent that the endowments of the mind and the virtues of the heart are the only imperishable, the only inestimable riches which he can leave to his posterity. I believe the American people, said Mr. B., to be the most enlightened upon earth; and I say this, with the full recollection of the ridicule attempted to be cast on the Federal Legislature, some ten years ago, for an imputed design to decree itself the wisest assembly in the world; which, if it had done, I, for one, should have placed the resolve in the chapter of decrees, true in themselves, but unseasonably proclaimed. I repeat the expression of my belief, with the full knowledge of the fact that, within three years past it has been tauntingly demanded, "who, in the four quarters of the globe, reads an American book?" And I know, that this supercilious interrogatory was put by the luminaries of the first city of a kingdom, the populace of whose second city, within that period, yes, within two years past, in open day, in the presence of the magistrates, in defiance of the laws, in masses of tens of thousands, rose upon a poor man, their countryman and fellow townsman, a maker of paints by trade, and demolished his house, destroyed his property, and were proceeding to put himself to death, when the arrival of dragoons and the blows of sabres released the victim; and all this, because this enlightened populace of the second city in the kingdom, had taken it into their illuminated heads to believe that the poor paintmaker compounded his red paints of little children's blood, whom he caught and killed for that purpose! And now, I would ask a question in my turn. I would ask, if there is a village in the most obscure part of the Republic in which even a mob of ten year old boys could have been raised upon such an absurd vile fabrication? But, I will answer the Edinburg question. I will tell these reviewers who it is, in the four quarters of the world, that reads an American book; and I will say that, wherever liberty exists, in whatsoever clime she has a temple and a votary, on whatsoever portion of the earth the hands of freemen are employed in laying the foundations of a new empire, or in repairing the ruins of an old one, whether it is in Europe or in Asia, in North or in South America, there American books are read, and not only read, but they bear away the palm from all that was ever written by the Lockes and Montesquieus of England and France, by the Platos and Solons of Greece and of Rome.

But, whether the objection to the intelligence of the people was well or ill founded in the year 1787, it was at least consistent with the intention of the Constitution at that time. It was the intention of that day that the people should not select the President; that they should limit themselves to the choice of Electors, to whose superior information and discernment the election of the Chief Magistrate should be entirely committed. But this intention has failed in practice. The people now select the candidate for the Presidency, and then choose an Elector pledged to support their choice. An objection to the intelligence of the people would, at this time, be both unfounded in fact, and inconsistent with established practice. The advocate for the objection would find himself in a dilemma, and I am curious to see upon which horn of it he would choose to hang himself in the face of the American people.

Sixth. Danger of tumults and popular commotions. This objection is taken from the history of the ancient republics; from the tumultuary elections of Rome and Greece. But the justness of the example is denied. There is nothing in the laws of physiology which admits a parallel between the vindictive Italian, the volatile Greek, and the phlegmatic American. There is nothing in the state of the respective countries, or in their manner of voting, which makes one an example for the other. The Romans voted in mass, at a single voting place, even when the qualified voters amounted to four millions of persons. They came to the polls armed, and divided into classes, and voted, not by heads, but by centuries. In the Grecian republics all the voters were brought together in one great city, and decided the contest in one great struggle. In such assemblages, both the inducement to violence, and the means of committing it, were prepared by the Government itself. In the United States all this is different. The voters are assembled in small bodies, at innumerable voting places, distributed over a vast extent of country. They come to the polls without arms, without odious distinctions, without any temptation to violence, and with every inducement to harmony. If heated during the day of election, they cool off upon returning to their homes, and resuming their ordinary occupations. A month afterwards, when the result of a Presidential election would be known, the body of the people would be too much occupied with their own concerns, and too sensible to the voice of reason, to think of taking up arms in favor of an unsuccessful candidate. The party, defeated at an election, must fight upon the spot, or never. Sleep and dispersion rapidly cool their belligerent passions. Instead of violence, it is apathy which we have to dread in our Presidential elections. There is too much apathy at this time upon the subject of the impending election. The intemperance of some newspapers, the heat of some cities, and the fury of some partisans furnish, no criterion for estimating the temper of the continent. The tranquillity of the American people is not affected by these local agitations. Some citizens confine themselves to the inquiry: "Who will you give us for President?" The question implying the humiliating fact that an American citizen has no weight in the choice of the first officer of the Republic. Others are quietly looking out for the best man to administer their affairs, and all agree in holding in the uttermost contempt every effort to impose upon their judgment, whether the fraud shall be exhibited in the shape of poisonous detraction, or of fulsome adulation.

But let us admit the truth of the objection. Let us admit that the American people would be as tumultuary at their Presidential elections, as were the citizens of the ancient Republics at the election of their Chief Magistrates. What then? Are we thence to infer the inferiority of the officers thus elected, and the consequent degradation of the countries over which they presided? I answer no. So far from it, that I assert the superiority of these officers over all others ever obtained for the same countries, either by hereditary succession, or the most select mode of election. I affirm those periods of history to be the most glorious in arms, the most renowned in arts, the most celebrated in letters, the most useful in practice, and the most happy in the condition of the people, in which the whole body of the citizens voted direct for the chief officer of their country. Take the history of that Commonwealth which yet shines as the leading star in the firmament of nations. Of the twenty-five centuries that the Roman State has existed, to what period do we look for the generals and statesmen, the poets and orators, the philosophers and historians, the sculptors, painters, and architects, whose immortal works have fixed upon their country the admiring eyes of all succeeding ages? Is it to the reigns of the seven first Kings?—to the reigns of the Emperors, proclaimed by the prætorian bands?—to the reigns of the Sovereign Pontiffs, chosen by a select body of electors in a conclave of most holy cardinals? No—we look to none of these, but to that short interval of four centuries and a half which lies between the expulsion of the Tarquins and the re-establishment of monarchy in the person of Octavius Cæsar. It is to this short period, during which the consuls, tribunes, and prætors, were annually elected by a direct vote of the people, to which we look ourselves, and to which we direct the infant minds of our children, for all the works and monuments of Roman greatness; for roads, bridges, and aqueducts, constructed; for victories gained, nations vanquished, commerce extended, treasure imported, libraries founded, learning encouraged, the arts flourishing, the city embellished, and the Kings of the earth humbly suing to be admitted into the friendship, and taken under the protection of the Roman people. It was of this magnificent period that Cicero spoke, when he proclaimed the people of Rome to be the masters of Kings, and the conquerors and commanders of all the nations of the earth. And, what is wonderful, during the whole period, in a succession of four hundred and fifty annual elections, the people never once preferred a citizen to the consulship who did not carry the prosperity and glory of the Republic to a point beyond that at which he had found it.

It is the same with the Grecian Republics. Thirty centuries have elapsed since they were founded; yet it is to an ephemeral period of one hundred and fifty years only, the period of popular elections, which intervened between the dispersion of a cloud of petty tyrants and the coming of a great one in the person of Philip, King of Macedon, that we are to look for that galaxy of names which shed so much lustre upon their country, and in which we are to find the first cause of that intense sympathy which now burns in our bosoms at the name of Greece.

These short and brilliant periods exhibit the great triumph of popular elections; often tumultuary, often stained with blood, but always ending gloriously for the country. Then the right of suffrage was enjoyed; the sovereignty of the people was no fiction. Then a sublime spectacle was seen, when the Roman citizen advanced to the polls and proclaimed: "I vote for Cato to be Consul;" the Athenian, "I vote for Aristides to be Archon;" the Theban, "I vote for Pelopidas to be Bæotarch;" the Lacedæmonian, "I vote for Leonidas to be first of the Ephori." And why cannot an American citizen do the same? Why may not he go up to the poll and proclaim, "I vote for Thomas Jefferson to be President of the United States?" Why is he compelled to put his vote in the hands of another, and to incur all the hazards of an irresponsible agency, when he himself could immediately give his vote for his own chosen candidate, without the slightest assistance from agents or managers?

But, said Mr. B., I have other objections to these intermediate Electors. They are the peculiar and favorite institution of aristocratic republics, and elective monarchies. I refer the Senate to the late Republics of Venice and Genoa; of France, and her litter; to the kingdom of Poland; the Empire of Germany, and the Pontificate of Rome. On the contrary, a direct vote by the people is the peculiar and favorite institution of democratic republics; as we have just seen in the Governments of Rome, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta; to which may be added the principal cities of the Amphyctionic and Achæan leagues, and the renowned Republic of Carthage when the rival of Rome.

I have now answered the objections which were brought forward in the year '87. I ask for no judgment upon their validity at that day, but I affirm them to be without force or reason in the year 1824. Time and experience have so decided. Yes, time and experience, the only infallible tests of good or bad institutions, have now shown that the continuance of the Electoral system will be both useless and dangerous to the liberties of the people, and that "the only effectual mode of preserving our Government from the corruptions which have undermined the liberty of so many nations, is, to confide the election of our Chief Magistrate to those who are farthest removed from the influence of his patronage;"* that is to say, to the whole body of American citizens!

One other objection yet remains to be named and answered, an objection of recent origin, stated for the first time on this floor, by the Senator from New York, (Mr. VAN BUREN.) In substance it is this, that, by giving the election to the people in districts, the votes for President would be more apt to scatter among various candidates, less apt to concentrate upon one or two; and thereby the chances of an eventual reference to the House of Representatives would be increased.

The analysis of this objection shows it to be an objection purely and simply to the district system, as the votes would be liable to scatter precisely as much in choosing Electors by districts, as in voting for President by districts. In either case the majority would lose the power of impressing the minority; and that they ought to lose it, has, in my opinion, been sufficiently shown in the beginning of this argument. But it is not admitted that the result would be as apprehended by the Senator from New York. In the first place, the candidates for the Presidency, be their number what it may in the first stages of the canvass, will always reduce themselves, or be reduced, by the force of circumstances, to two or three individuals, before the day of election comes round. In the second place, admitting that the votes of one State may scatter, yet the votes of all the others may scatter likewise; and what is lost by a particular candidate in one State may be gained by him in another.

FOURTH.—To continue the umpirage in the House of Representatives, in all cases in which no candidate receives a majority of the whole number of votes.

This is the last proposition, said Mr. B., which I have had the honor to submit to the consideration of the Senate. In taking it up I have to regret that I shall find myself separating in opinion from those from whom I can never divide without a painful apprehension that I am going into error. My sensibility to this unpleasant sensation is increased upon this occasion, because, in dividing from so many whose judgments I reverence, I seem to take the direct road which leads to the interest of my own State. But, notwithstanding the embarrassing effect of this appearance, I will cheerfully throw myself upon the candor of the Senate while I briefly show that the real interest of Missouri, in this question, is directly opposite to what it seems to be.

This infant State is now called small; but she contains all the elements of future greatness. She has sixty thousand square miles of territory, and a soil and climate adapted to the support of the heaviest population. Her mines and salines will give rise to great manufacturing establishments. Her geographical position, in the centre of the valley of the Mississippi, will give her great political weight, and in war her whole force will be disposable, because she, herself, will be inattackable. The wonderful phenomenon of thirty thousand miles of navigable water, uniting in her centre, and flowing, by one channel, to the Gulf of Mexico, will give her commercial advantages unequalled by any other interior part of the globe. On the basis of the ordinary population of old countries, one hundred and fifty to the square mile, she will be able to contain nine millions of souls, equal to the entire white population of the United States at this day. Looking to these facts, and it is clear that the permanent interest of Missouri lies with the powerful, not with the weak States. But, leaving out of view all considerations of this kind; placed on a theatre which is elevated far above the atmosphere of local interests; charged with the sacred duty of legislating for the whole American people, I claim for myself no more than I freely grant to every member of the Senate, a sincere desire to perpetuate our republican institutions, and to save that union of the States upon which will depend the happiness and prosperity of our descendants, when we ourselves shall be beyond the reach of any earthly government, either good or bad.

The amendment reported by the committee proposes to take away from the House of Representatives the eventual right of voting by States for President, and to vest it in both Houses of Congress, voting by heads. The effect of this amendment would be to give the election of President, unconditionally and absolutely, to the powerful States.

I am opposed to the principle of this amendment, because it goes to the subversion of the Government under which we live.

The Constitution of '87, reposes upon two principles: one federative, depending upon the States; the other representative, depending upon population. Both are combined throughout the whole frame of the General Government. The most inconsiderable bill cannot become a law of Congress, without submitting to the authority of each of these principles. It must receive the double ratification, once by a majority of people in the House of Representatives, and once by a majority of States in this chamber. The two principles are absolute in their application to every measure of the Federal Legislature; but, in the election of President, the federative principle is contingent, and contingent too upon the will of those who have the inclination and the power to prevent the contingency from ever happening.

Before the adoption of the Constitution, the federative principle alone operated. There was but one House of Congress, each State had but one vote, and the majority of States decided every question.

The Constitution itself, was formed in the same way, in a convention voting by States, and the majority of States deciding every question.

The great difficulty in the convention was, to fix upon the mode in which votes should be counted upon national subjects; the large States wishing that a majority of population should prevail, and the small ones, that a majority of States should govern. The result was a compromise, by which both principles were brought into operation, each as a check upon the other.

The combination was new and happy. No example in any previous confederacy, nor any writer in theory, had furnished the hint. The world is indebted for it to the great men who framed the American Constitution, and, beyond all doubt, it will give a duration to our Government which could not be expected from a simple confederation, voting by States, nor from a consolidated republic deciding every question by the majority of numbers.

But no human institution is perfect, nor are there any two principles upon earth which can precisely balance each other. One must be the weakest, from the beginning; and, in practice, the weak must become weaker, and the strong more powerful, until the absolute mastery of one, and the absolute subserviency of the other, is completely established.

In the plan of our Government, the federative principle is the weak; the representative, the strong one. The federative, rests upon the States, which are few; the representative, upon the people, who are numerous. In time, the most powerful must master the other; and the attack has now begun.

The amendment reported by the committee, is an attack upon this principle, not in its whole extent, but in one point. What is this point? It is called "an election of President by the House of Representatives."

In researches after truth, it is important to use accurate expressions. This phrase is not accurate. The House of Representatives have no power to "elect," a President. They have no elective faculty, no power of choice; they are limited to the humble occupation of preferring one out of three, each of whom may be obnoxious to them. They are nothing but arbitrators, referred to as mutual friends, to settle a question of mutual interest. A reference to the House of Representatives, is clearly a case of a nomination of three candidates by the people, and the acceptance of one by the States; with the important qualification that the people only nominate to the States when they cannot agree among themselves. It is not a case of "election;" but a sort of substitute for the gold and silver balls in the choice of a Doge of Venice.

Before we examine the objections to the main question, we will stop a moment to examine the case of 1800, the example always referred to as the one to be dreaded, and to avoid the repetition of which, is one of the main arguments in favor of amending the Constitution. Now, the fact is, the case of 1800 cannot possibly happen again. It was not for want of a majority that the decision then went to the House of Representatives; for two candidates had each a majority, and that majority was the same; 73 for Mr. Jefferson, and 73 for Mr. Burr. It was not for want of a majority, but for want of designation, that the question went to the House; and this can never happen again, for the Constitution has been amended, and the votes given for President, and Vice President, are now designated in the ballots. The fact of that case can never happen again, nor the excitement which it produced. What was the cause of that excitement; of that indignation and rage which inflamed the country? It was the fact that a man who had not received one vote for President was about to be made President over the man who had received a majority of the people's votes; it was because a candidate, preferred by one party to the second office in the Republic, was taken up by the opposite party, turned upon his old friends, and made the instrument of crushing their success in the moment of enjoyment; it was because the people were to be cheated out of their choice by what they believed to be a fraudulent and treasonable combination against them. If the thirty-six ballotings had been between Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson, there would have been no talk of a civil war, no menace of marching troops. Both these gentlemen had been voted for as President; the country was nearly divided between them, and the defeated party would have taken their defeat tranquilly, because it would have been fair. The case of 1800 can never happen again, neither in point of fact, nor in the excitement which it produced, and I protest against it as an argument in favor of altering the Constitution.

Mr. B. then proceeded to the objections brought against the continuance of this power in the House of Representatives. These were of two kinds: one of principle, because it levelled the power of the States; the other of detail, because the House of Representatives is held to be an unfit depository of this principle.

To show the possible operation of this principle, a table has been exhibited in all the newspapers, demonstrating that thirty-one members of Congress, from thirteen of the smallest States, may be able to decide the election. The table is not new. It was exhibited in the Convention of '87, and in the Virginia Convention, which ratified the Constitution; and produced, at that time, a result still more astounding; for, according to these tables, fifteen members, from the seven smallest States, were to effect the election. I refer to these old calculations for the purpose of showing that the evil now so much dreaded is not a new discovery, but was perfectly understood before the adoption of the Constitution; and, though urged in its most imposing form, was not sufficient to prevent its adoption in a single State. It was then considered, as it now must be, as the mere calculation of a possible case which can never happen. So many States, so widely dispersed, (for the table takes in Maine and Louisiana, Delaware and Missouri, Rhode Island and Alabama, and many others equally remote from each other,) so many States, without community of interest or feeling, can never unite in a common object, still less to effect their purpose by the miraculous coincidence of a majority of one in thirteen successive instances; and without this miraculous concurrence of the same majority, the table loses all its imposing effect, and would show thirteen States, having forty-five representatives, and entitled to seventy-one electoral votes, uniting in one object, and deciding the election. Mr. B. said he would exhibit another table to the Senate, which he believed to be new, and not only possible, but probable.

The whole number of electoral votes at present is two hundred and sixty-one; of these, one hundred and thirty-two are given by six States, which choose their Electors either by general ticket or legislative ballot. The same candidate may be taken up by the dominant party in each of these States, and may succeed in each by a bare majority, say a majority of one; he will then have seventy-two voluntary votes, and sixty impressed ones. All the other States may be against him, yet he is elected; elected by six States against the eighteen; by seventy-two votes against one hundred and eighty-nine; by two million eight hundred thousand people against seven million two hundred thousand! Yet this is called an election by the people, an election by the majority, when it is shown that it may be the work of one-fourth part of the States, one-fourth part of the votes, and one-fourth part of the people! But, it may be said, that this is a mere case of possibility, which can never happen. I answer, to the letter it is not expected to happen, but, in effect, it not only can happen, but is extremely probable. The six States referred to are proximate to each other, and can easily combine. They may differ about the individual they would prefer for President, but they are all united in one wish, one design, one interest, in keeping the decision from the States in the House of Representatives. They all have the same horror at the idea of seeing themselves balanced on a final vote by the single representative from Illinois, Delaware, Mississippi, and Missouri; and there is no knowing to what compromises this community of feeling, and this joint horror, may lead. Certainly, while the Electors continue to be chosen by general ticket and legislative ballot, it is a farce to talk about the will of the people; and with every disposition to treat the subject candidly, I think the majority of the people have about as good a chance for succeeding in the House of Representatives, as they have in a vote by Electors thus chosen.

I have said that the principle of the amendment reported by the committee, goes to the subversion of the Government under which we live. That principle is, that the majority of the people ought to govern. Certainly this is correct in a consolidated Republic; but apply it to the equal representation of the States in the Senate Chamber. There are twenty-six Senators from thirteen States, containing a population of two millions; that is, a majority of Senators representing one-fifth of the population! Apply it to the ratification of treaties. Eighteen Senators from nine States, containing a population of one million of inhabitants, may prevent the ratification of a treaty supported by thirty Senators, representing nine millions of people! Apply it to the mode of amending the Constitution, which requires a concurrence of three-fourths, and the result may show you fourteen Senators from seven States, containing six hundred and forty thousand souls, preventing the adoption of an amendment against the vote of thirty-four Senators representing nine and a half millions of people! But, it will be said, there is no danger of any attack upon the Senate. I answer, that thirty years ago there was no visible danger of any attack upon the rights of the States in the eventual vote for President, and twenty years hence the class of small States, now so much the most numerous, will become the smallest number. At present we count eighteen small and six great States, but in this count the estimate turns upon population, which is constantly varying, and not upon the size of the States, which is fixed and permanent. All the Western States now in existence, will be of the largest class. Those to be created will also be of the largest size. They will wish it, to gratify their pride, and it will be granted them, to lessen their relative weight in the Senate. Five new States of the largest class, must be admitted within some years: Florida 48,000 square miles, Arkansas 60,-

000, and three more in the Northwest Territory, between the State of Illinois and Lake Superior, averaging 50,000 square miles each. The relative proportions of great and small States will then be reversed, and a proposition which cannot be defended by any one now, will then be as popular as is the present attack upon the eventual right of the States to decide a Presidential election.

Gentlemen say there is no danger of any attack upon the equal representation of the States in the Senate. But I ask if there are no "private griefs" even now upon this subject? The Holy Scriptures tell us, that out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh; and hath not the mouth spoken, and the heart betrayed its fulness upon this very subject, within a few short days past?

[Here Mr. BENTON read the following extract from Mr. VAN BUREN's speech in the Senate, December 29th.]

"The great Departments of the Government were, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. The latter is organized by the two former, and the influence of the respective States, in its organization, is of course the same as it is in the other two. In the choice of the Executive, and in the popular branch of the Legislature, each State has a representation proportioned to its representative numbers, with this exception, that, in the choice of the Executive, an addition of two votes was given to each State, without regard to its numbers, or the amount of its contribution to the public Treasury. But in this branch of the Legislature the case is widely different. Here, in consequence of the peculiarity of our condition, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the equitable principle of representation, founded on population and contribution, has been entirely disregarded. Here each State, on the score of its sovereign character, has equal weight; and what, he asked, was the relative importance of this branch in the Government? He would not say it was that by which all the efficient power of the Government was controlled, but he would say, that but a slight consideration of the Constitution was necessary to show that this branch did so more than any other. With the single exception of originating revenue bills, its legislative powers were coextensive with the popular branch. No law could pass without the assent of the Senate. Almost all the important proceedings of the Executive are subject to its revision. All appointments require its approbation, unless its assent is first obtained to a law providing a different mode. The consent of two-thirds of this body is necessary to the validity of all treaties; and it has the sole power to try impeachments of all the high officers of the Government, as well Executive as Judicial. In a branch of the Government possessing such extensive powers, the small but patriotic State of Illinois, with a population of fifty-five thousand, has a representation equal to that of Pennsylvania, with a population of one million and fifty thousand. The five largest States in the Confederacy, viz: Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, and New York, with a population of four millions eight hundred thousand, have a representation but equal to the five smallest States, with a population of three hundred and fifty-three thousand. Nearly one-half the nation, residing in the five largest States, has a representation but equal to the one twenty-seventh part residing in the five smallest States. About one-half the whole people, residing in five States, are represented here by ten voices, whilst the other half are represented by thirty-four voices. The disproportion of the relative influence of the several States, having reference to their population as a just basis of representation, cannot fail to strike every mind. The same inequality existed at the adoption of the Constitution, but in a much less degree. Then, taking an average of the population of the States, and considering those as small who do not come up to it, the large States were in a majority; now, by the admission of new States, with assent of the old, they are in a minority. There were, at that period, eight large and five small States. Now, by the same criterion, there would be found to be but ten large and fourteen small States. Still this was all right; it was according to the compact into which all the States had voluntarily entered; and he fervently hoped, for the peace and happiness of the people of these States, that the day might be far distant, when even a desire should be entertained to alter it."

[Mr. B. also read the following extracts from Mr. McDUFFIE's speech in the House of Representatives, January 16th.]

"Now, said Mr. McDUFFIE, there is no political principle more undeniable than that the deliberate opinion and settled conviction of a majority of the people, (in a government recognising in them the right and the capacity of self-government,) ought to prevail over the will of the minority, even in relation to the Constitution. Why, then, it may be asked, does that instrument require, for an amendment, the concurrence of more than a majority? I answer for the very wisest of purposes; but not surely to give the permanent ascendancy to the opinion of the minority. This requirement was intended for no other purpose, than to prevent hasty and inconsiderate changes, and to give time for reflection and deliberation. But when the sense of a decided majority of the community is permanently and unalterably settled down in favor of any amendment, the end of this provision is answered, and the minority ought to yield. I will not say that they have not the Constitutional right, as well as power, to oppose the will of the majority; but I contend that it is their moral duty, as well as their undoubted interest, to yield, under such circumstances."

"The small States are the favorites of the Constitution, and, even under the proposed amendment, would be eminently so. A very slight examination will make this apparent. There are seven States in the Union which, together, contain a population smaller than that of North Carolina. What is their relative power? They have fourteen votes in the Senate, a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, while North Carolina has but two! This, too, is a power of which they can never be deprived. And yet we are told that the small States are in danger of oppression!"

"The seven States to which I have alluded, are entitled to twenty-six electoral votes, while North Carolina, with a larger population, is entitled to fifteen only. States having but a single Representative are entitled to three Electors for a population of forty thousand, whereas the large States are entitled to but little more than one Elector for the same population."

Mr. B. did not read these extracts for the purpose of arguing against them. He read them as a solemn warning to the small States, as proof that all their rights were in danger, their equal representation upon this floor, and their existence in the Constitution itself, which, it is openly contended, ought to be amended by a bare majority of population, without any regard to the sovereignty of the States which composed it. Let it not be said that the Constitution will protect the rights of the small States. The Constitution itself may be amended, not at this moment, while the small States are the majority, but some twenty or thirty years hence, when there shall be eighteen or twenty large States, and no more than eight or ten small ones. The knowledge of this ultimate and approaching danger should warn the small States, at this moment, to stand together, and to resist this attack upon their rights. They have already lost one half of the privilege secured to them by the Constitution of 1787. By the Constitution of that day the States in the House of Representatives had the privilege of choosing a President from the five highest on the list of candidates; by the amendment of 1803, they are reduced to a choice out of three. The range of selection is narrowed one half by this first amendment, and now, by a second amendment, it is proposed to take away the right altogether. It is thus that the federative principle, the weak principle of our Government, is sinking under the attacks of the representative principle, by which it must eventually be overpowered and destroyed.

The amendment reported by the committee reposes upon a false principle. It is made to depend upon the present unequal population of the States; and the argument in support of it is, that it is unjust that Missouri, Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Indiana, should have as much weight as New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, North Carolina, and Massachusetts, in the decision of the Presidential election. Now, the six States objected to, as small, contain 300,000 square miles, while the six referred to, as large, contain but 245,000. The first six, upon every principle of relative power, will be the most powerful in the lapse of some years. They have the greatest number of square miles; they are capable of sustaining the heaviest population; they are interior States, and their whole force will be disposable in time of war. Admitting them to be correctly classed among small States, at present, on account of their population, yet this classification is temporary, and is altering itself every day, and it is false policy to alter a permanent instrument, the Constitution of the Republic, for a temporary evil, which will correct itself in the course of a few years.

The amendment of the committee turns upon a false principle, again, in assuming, as probable, what has not yet happened under the Constitution, and, in all probability, will not happen for an age to come. It turns upon the probability of carrying the Presidential election to the House of Representatives, for want of a majority of votes in favor of any one candidate. This is a contingency which has not yet happened. The case of Burr and Jefferson, so constantly quoted, is not a case in point. It was not for want of a majority that these gentlemen appeared before the House of Representatives, but for want of discrimination, and that is now provided against by the amendment to the Constitution, which requires the Electors to vote separately for President and Vice President. The Constitution has been in force thirty-six years; nine elections have taken place; a majority of electoral votes has always been given to some one candidate; and, in the case of Jefferson and Burr, a majority was given to two candidates. No election has gone to the House of Representatives for want of a majority, and it now depends upon the act of those States, half a dozen in number, which have the will and the power to prevent it, whether the pending election, or any future one, shall go there for that cause; and, when we look to the increased sensibilities of these States upon this point, the prospect of such an occurrence becomes a most remote and improbable contingency.

Mr. B. was opposed to the committee's amendment, because it went to unsettle one of the compromises upon which the Constitution reposes. He quoted a part of Mr. Madison's speech in the Virginia Convention, to prove the right in question to have been a compromise between the great and small States:

"As to the eventual voting (for President) by States," said Mr. Madison, "it has my approbation. The lesser States, and some larger ones, will be pleased by that mode. The deputies from the small States argued, and there was some force in their reasoning, that, when the people voted, the large States evidently had the advantage, and, without varying the mode, the interest of the small States might be neglected or sacrificed. Here is a compromise."

Everybody knows that, without compromise, the Constitution of 1787 could not have been framed; and it is a fair inference that, unless these compromises are preserved inviolate, the Constitution must perish. It was a compromise between the slave-holding and non-slave-holding States to admit a qualified representation of the black population; it was a compromise between the large and small States which produced an equality of representation in the Senate; and it was a compromise between the same large and small States which gave the election of President, in the first trial, to the people; and, if they failed to make a choice, then referred to the States. Destroy either of these compromises, and one of the pillars is taken away which now supports the edifice of the Constitution.

I know that it is the fashion to cry down the House of Representatives, but there are positive advantages in referring the election, upon the second trial, to that House. In the first place, it is necessary to the safety and respectability of the small States that they should stand for something in the Presidential election. In a mere vote of numbers, they are lost. No President, or candidate for the Presidency, would court their good will, even by doing them justice. Their most meritorious citizens would apply in vain for the humblest appointment. All the Executive favors would flow into the great States in reward of past services, or to induce new exertions. In the second place, it imposes a salutary restraint upon the ambition and violence of the great States. The House of Representatives stands before them in terrorem. They are constantly admonished to act with moderation, good faith, and harmony, by the danger of seeing the election slip out of their hands. It compels the Electors, also, to vote in good faith. They are to have but one trial. There is no room for experimental voting; no room for combinations; no room for false runnings upon different candidates. It deranges any scheme of corruption, by changing both the Electors and the mode of voting. It conforms to the will of the people; for the Representatives in Congress are now chosen with an eye to their contingent faculty of Electors of President; and care is taken to elect those only who will obey the wishes of their constituents. In addition to all these reasons, the House of Representatives is a safer depository of the elective privilege than any other body of equal numbers which either exists at this time or can be created under the Constitution of the United States. Who composes the House of Representatives? Aged men, and men in the meridian of life, who have filled the first offices in their own States, or under the General Government, whose integrity has been tested by a long course of public service and of devotion to the people's interest; young men, appearing above the political horizon, their bosoms filled with noble aspiration, looking forward to the first honors of their country, and looked to by their country as the future leaders of the Republic. If it is said that there may be some bad material in the House, I will ask for the body of equal numbers in which there is so little. And I will maintain that the House of Representatives has ever been, now is, and while the Republic lives it must continue to be, for talent, for integrity, and for elevation of character, the first body of men of equal numbers which either exists in our own or in any other country in the world. To my mind, therefore, there is no place more safe for depositing the right of the States to decide the Presidential election, than this House is. Still this is a detail. The great principle for which I contend is, that, after one trial by the people, the next shall be by the States. The States may have the benefit of this principle in more ways than one.

Some gentlemen are in favor of remanding the election to the Electoral Colleges. Much as I am opposed to that mode of proceeding, my objections would be half diminished, if, in this second trial, the Electors were required to vote by States—the Electors of each State giving one vote. Still I would prefer the House of Representatives, for the reasons already mentioned, and for another which had great weight with the framers of our Constitution. It is already seen, by looking to the powers of the Senate, and to the powers of the House of Representatives, how much the former exceed the latter. The Senate have all powers which belong to the House, except the faculty of originating money bills, and of preferring impeachments; but, even in these exceptions, the power of the Senate is still predominant; for the money bill cannot raise a dollar, nor the impeachment remove one delinquent from office, without the consent of the Senate.

Besides a concurrent power in legislation, the Senate is clothed with the extraordinary powers which in monarchies belong to the King, or to an hereditary body of nobles. In its power over the ratification of treaties, it controls the legislation of the whole Union. It controls the President, in his strong arm, in his power of appointment to office. It presides in some degree over the administration of justice, in its power of appointment and removal of the federal judges. It is the judge of the President himself—can try him for an imputed misdemeanor, and pronounce the forfeiture of his office. To this accumulation of powers is superadded a duration in office longer than is enjoyed by any other officer of the State or National Governments. The framers of the Constitution foresaw that, in the presence of a body thus constituted, the House of Representatives—the popular branch of the Legislature, and the peculiar depository of the republican principle—would be in danger of dwindling into comparative insignificance, unless armed with some prerogative peculiar to itself. Hence was conferred upon it the right to originate revenue bills, to institute impeachments, and to act as umpire, in the last resort, between the leading candidates for the Presidential Chair.

Mr. B. confirmed this view by reading a part of the sixty-seventh number of the Federalist, in which it is stated expressly, that as a counterpoise to the extraordinary powers of the Senate, and to secure the equilibrium of the House of Representatives, the three prerogatives enumerated were conferred upon it, and the last particularly relied upon:

“The House of Representatives will be the umpire in all elections of the President which do not unite the suffrages of a majority of the whole number of Electors—a case which it cannot be doubted will sometimes, if not frequently, happen. The constant possibility of the thing must be a fruitful source of influence to that body. The more it is contemplated, the more important will appear this ultimate, this contingent power, of deciding the competitions of the most illustrious citizens of the Union for the first office in it. It would not perhaps be rash to predict that, as a mean of influence, it will be found to outweigh all the peculiar attributes of the Senate.”

Upon this exposition, Mr. B. submitted it to the Senate to say whether it was not highly objectionable to strip the House of Representatives of a power given to it as a counterpoise to the Senate, and particularly so for the Senate itself to commence this work of spoliation?

It has been seen that every argument that can be urged in favor of taking from the small States their eventual chance to act a part in the Presidential election, may be carried forward and urged with greater force in favor of depriving them of their equal representation in the Senate. Let it be supposed, then, that the present attempt has succeeded; what next? Why, an open attack upon the constitution of the Senate. Speakers of portentous ability, like the Senator from New York, (Mr. VAN BUREN,) and the Representative from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) whose sentiments have been already quoted, will display the enormity of the principle which gives to the eighty thousand inhabitants of Rhode Island as many Senators as belong to the million and a half of New York. Hundreds of presses, and a thousand subaltern orators will repeat, that, in a Republic, the majority ought to govern. All the powerful States will adopt this principle, and eventually the representation of the Senate will be bottomed upon population and not upon States. What, then, will be the condition of the Republic? Consolidation! It is in vain to say that the States will still have their territorial limits, their Governors, and local Legislatures. Russia, and even Turkey, have their provinces, their governors, and provincial governments. Our Federal Government will be changed from a federation of States, into a Republic "one and indivisible," in which the majority of numbers will decide every question. The two Houses of Congress, like the council of five hundred, and the council of two hundred and fifty, will rest upon numbers, and the Representatives from the most populous sections of the Union, being a majority in both Houses, will decide all questions to suit the interest of their own section. Could the United States stand this? All the books answer, no. The framers of the Constitution said, no. The experience of thirty-six years answers, no. The Missouri question gives the same answer. And what would be the result if the tariff, now depending, could be regulated by either of the three great interests of agriculture, commerce, or manufactures? We all profess an abhorrence of consolidation, but we disagree in the definition. In my opinion the consolidation of our Federal Government would be complete when a majority of numbers shall govern in both branches of the Legislature. The powerful States, the populous sections, the predominating interests, would then prevail; the weak States, the less populous divisions, the inferior interests, would be sacrificed. In opposing this state of things, I am not pleading for myself, for my own State; nor for the section from which I come. I belong to the Valley of the Mississippi, great in extent, indivisible in policy, capable of sustaining an hundred millions of people. Sectionally I have nothing to fear from a consolidation of the federal power; as a lover of the Union, I fear every thing. I fear for the small States, and, in their fate, for the Union itself. Not for the small States of the West, for they will be great; but for the small States of the Atlantic board, part of the old thirteen, to whose heroic efforts in the war of the Revolution—to whose confiding spirit in the Convention of 1787, we are indebted for the privilege of sitting, this day, in consultation upon their rights. Which are these small States? They are Massachusetts, with 8,000 square miles; New Hampshire, 10,000; Vermont, 10,000; Rhode Island, 1,360; Connecticut, 4,600; New Jersey, 7,000; Delaware, 2,000;

Maryland, 11,000; Maine, 30,000; South Carolina, 30,000. Let not these two last object to this classification. They have but half the superficial content of the States of the first magnitude. They are border States, and will have no disposable force in time of war. In spite of their noble spirit, their intellectual and moral worth, they are condemned by the inexorable voice of their boundary lines, to take their permanent place in the class of the small States. These are the States which are to suffer by yielding the election of President to the populous States, by giving to all the States a representation according to population in the Senate; in fine, by carrying into effect the principle that, in the Federal Government, the majority of numbers shall decide every question. Under the operation of that principle, the confederation of the States would degenerate into an alliance between the weak and the strong, without any check in favor of the weak; a sort of alliance which, in all ages, and in all countries, has been nothing but the realities of the fabled alliance between the giant and the dwarf. Look to the Amphycyonic league, composed of thirty members, yet only three known to history: Thebes, Sparta, and Athens, each predominating by turns, and governing and chastising the weaker cities as they pleased. The Germanic confederation, consisting of three hundred members, yet the whole power usurped by nine Electors; the small States summoned before the Imperial Diet, placed under the ban of the empire, and their territories given up to pillage and military occupation. The seven United Provinces, in which the province of Holland alone decided upon peace and war, loans and taxes, and dragooned the inferior provinces into acquiescence. The Swiss confederacy, the large cantons making war upon the small ones on account of their religion, and calling in the Dukes of Savoy to assist in the chastisement. The framers of the Constitution had these examples before their eyes, and we have had another, a real history of the giant and the dwarfs; the Confederation of the Rhine, in which the petty princes of Germany, uniting with Napoleon the Great, to get their heads broken in every corner of Europe, and to see their Lilliputian territories ravaged by strange men from the confines of Asia. The principle that the majority ought to govern, so correct when applied to the government of the respective States, is false and ruinous when applied to the Federal Government of the United States. The Union could not have been formed on that principle, nor could it now exist under it if introduced. The federative principle yielded all that can be yielded, in the Convention of 1787. To attack that principle now, is, in my opinion, to attack the existence of the small States, and the continuance of the Union. For one, I should deem it my sacred duty to resist these attacks in any situation, but more especially in this chamber, instituted for the express purpose of preserving to the small States the remnants of sovereignty which were left to them by the Convention of 1787.

The peculiar faculty of the American Senate is conservative. It is formed upon the principle of the Roman Tribunate, to preserve, not Plebians against Patricians, but the weak against the powerful States. Yes, Senators, you are the Tribunes of the States; you are the barrier between the weak—the adamant wall, behind which the most feeble States shall repose in safety, before which the most powerful shall beat in vain. And will you act contrary to the principle of your institution? Will you begin with surrendering that which you are created to defend? Will you set the example of destroying that which you were instituted to preserve? Will you subtract from the strength of the weak, and add to the power of the powerful; and this too, in the face of the fact, that these powerful States refused to adopt the district system because it will lessen their capacity to dominate over their feeble neighbors? I trust that the Senate will not act thus; and I think that the great States ought not to ask it. They should remember that this Constitution was formed by States, each giving one vote; that a Congress of States was then in existence, under the Articles of Confederation, deciding every question by States, each giving one vote. They should consider how much was surrendered by the small States, when they voluntarily relinquished this condition of equality, and submitted to have all their rights and interests controlled by the superior population of the great States in the House of Representatives, and to have the National Executive subject to be elected by the same population, and often as half a dozen powerful States could agree among themselves. In addition to these sacrifices upon the altar of compromise, they should consider how much more has been taken by the natural tendency of the strong to encroach upon the weak; and they should ask themselves if it is right to unsettle the compromises of the year 1787—to attack the privileges then left to the small States—to assert a principle which goes to the subversion of the Federal Government—and to promote that system of consolidation which is wrapped up in the doctrine of giving the power of the Federal Government to those sections of the Union which have the majority of population? I can well conceive that it would be mortifying to Virginia, New York, and Pennsylvania, to see themselves balanced on a final vote for President, by Missouri, Illinois, and Mississippi; but they should reflect that the sting of their mortification would be transitory, while the benefit of the Constitution is permanent. Missouri, Illinois, and Mississippi, and I may add Indiana, Alabama, and Louisiana, are rapidly advancing to the point when it will be no disparagement to the greatest States to admit their equality. In the mean time it would be impertinent in me, a Senator from the youngest State in the Union, to offer advice to those which are old and powerful; but it may be useful to remind them of the counsel given to them by the most eminent of their own citizens, at a time when the good will of the small States was of more account than it seems to be at present:

"A common government, with powers equal to its objects, is called for by the voice, and still more loudly by the political situation of America. A government founded on principles more consonant to the wishes of the larger States is not likely to be obtained from the smaller States. The only option, then, for the former, lies between the proposed government and a government still more objectionable. Under this alternative, the advice of prudence must be, to embrace the lesser evil, and instead of indulging a fruitless anticipation of the possible evils which may ensue, to contemplate rather the advantageous consequences which may qualify the sacrifice."—Federalist, No. 62.

Mr. B. concluded with an expression of his extreme gratitude for the indulgent attention with which he had been heard by the Senate. He would not trespass longer upon their patience by delivering any thing in the form of recapitulation. He limited himself to saying, that, until the contrary should be shown, he held the four propositions, with which he sat out, to be completely established.

When Mr. BENTON had concluded—

On motion of Mr. EATON, the further consideration of the resolution was postponed till Monday next.

WEDNESDAY, February 4.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of George Sutton, and others, reported a bill in further addition to "An act to establish a uniform rule of Naturalization;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of William Venable and wife, and Jonathan Morgan and Jane his wife, and daughter of said Venable, stating, that one Peter Woolsey, who had been a private in the Army, during the late war, and now deceased, bequeathed to the wife of William Venable the military bounty land to which he was entitled, and to the wife of Jonathan Morgan the arrears of pay and pension due to him at the time of his decease, and which they cannot receive unless by the authority of Congress; and praying relief. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, presented the memorial and remonstrance of Mark Butts, and others, citizens of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying that no law may be enacted vesting in the Common Council of Alexandria the power of appointing flour and tobacco inspectors, or of regulating the inspection of flour or tobacco; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FINDLAY presented the memorial of Thomas Stevenson, and others, tallow-chandlers and soap-boilers, of the city of Philadelphia, praying that no additional duty may be laid on imported tallow; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, presented the petition of Hezekiah Langley, praying the payment of his account for his materials and labor in fitting up a room in the City Hall for the accommodation of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, in the county of Washington; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the petition of Charles Olivier Devezin, praying to be confirmed in his title to a tract of land in Louisiana; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, by a resolution of the Senate, of the 27th ultimo, reported a bill authorizing the register of the land office for the western district of the State of Louisiana to report upon certain land claims within the said district; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements, showing the contracts made by the Department of War in the year 1823; which was read.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer; and it was postponed to and made the order of the day for Monday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, to instruct the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of making further provision, by law, to prevent frauds in surveying the public lands; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Public Lands on the petition of Andrew Henshaw; and it was further postponed until to-morrow.

The bill to enable the holders of French, British, and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the State of Louisiana situate to the east of the Mississippi river and island of New Orleans, which have not been recognised as valid by the Government of the United States, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof, was read the second time.

FLORIDA LAND CLAIMS.

The bill, from the House of Representatives, to extend the time for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Florida, with the amendment thereto, proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, in the Senate, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, Mr. MACON in the chair.

This bill proposes to extend, to the first of January next, the time to which the commissioners, appointed under the act of Congress for ascertaining claims and titles to lands in the Territory of Florida, were limited in the reception of the evidence of such claims. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands merely defines the kind of evidence of title to be received; the compensation to the secretary of the commissioners, and some other details. A debate arose on the subject, in which Messrs. EATON, CHANDLER, LLOYD, of Maryland; LOWRIE, LLOYD, of Massachusetts, MILLS, FINDLAY, SMITH, BARTON, and BELL, took part.

A motion to postpone the subject, indefinitely, made by Mr. CHANDLER, was lost, as was also a motion, by Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, to amend the bill so as to reduce the jurisdiction of the commissioners from claims of three thousand five hundred acres, to those which comprise only one thousand acres.

On motion of Mr. FINDLAY, the section which requires the secretaries of the Board of Commissioners, who have received salaries, to refund any fees which they may have received from claimants, for making record of their claims, was stricken out. The bill was then reported to the Senate, with the amendments.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, moved to restore the section which was stricken out, on motion of Mr. FINDLAY, in Committee of the Whole, which was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, passed to a third reading.

THURSDAY, February 5.

The amendments to the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for the settlement of private land claims, in the Territory of Florida," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, called up the petition of Daniel Brown, presented at the last session, praying the equitable settlement of his accounts; and it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of William Bartlett, and others, of Newburyport, praying indemnification for depredations committed on their commerce by the private and public armed vessels of France, from the year 1793 to 1800; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FINDLAY presented the memorial of Peter Hill and others, of Ebenezer Ferguson and others, and of Joseph Bishop and others, of the city and county of Philadelphia, severally praying that the tariff may be so modified, as to afford that protection to manufactures which is extended to commerce. The memorials were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. HAYNE presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Charleston, South Carolina, praying the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion, by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Elizabeth McFarland, and she had leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

The bill in further addition to "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization;" and the bill authorizing the register of the land office for the western district of the State of Louisiana to report upon certain land claims, within the said district, were severally read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Public Lands, unfavorable to the petition of Andrew Henshaw. This petitioner claims of the Government $930 82, for surveying performed by him as deputy under a surveyor of the United States lands south of Tennessee. He had, according to custom, given to the surveyor his receipt for this amount, (without, in fact, receiving the money,) in order that the papers might be forwarded to the General Land Office. In the meanwhile, the surveyor died, and, at the time of his decease, was in arrears to the Government. The deputy surveyor now prays that he may be paid for his services. The report was opposed by Messrs. KING of Alabama, and KELLY, and supported by Messrs. EATON and BARTON. A motion, by Mr. KING, to reverse the report, was lost; the report of the committee was agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. KING, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his papers.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, submitted the following motion for consideration, which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay to the widow of Samuel Turner, jr., deceased, late principal clerk in his office, the sum of — dollars, out of the contingent fund, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of his funeral.

The resolution passed to a second reading.

PENNSYLVANIA RESOLUTIONS—TARIFF.

Mr. FINDLAY communicated the following preamble and resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, viz:

"To provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare of the people of the United States, are the great objects for which the Government of the Union is instituted. Among the diversified measures adopted by Congress, in the prosecution of these objects, the present tariff was established, with a partial view to encourage and protect national industry, the principal source of public wealth. But, in the progress of events, experience has fully demonstrated the inadequacy of the present rate of imposts to protect domestic manufactures against a foreign competition, enjoying the advantages of capital and experience, matured skill, and the artificial encouragements of premiums and bounties; and that, without additional protection from the General Government, the country must continue indebted to foreign supply, for even many articles of manufacture immediately connected with the defence and independence of the nation. Believing it to be the duty of the General Government to cherish and foster internal industry, as the means of promoting the general welfare; that it would be wise policy in Congress to countervail, by protecting duties, the political regulations of foreign Governments which operate injuriously on the commercial and agricultural interests of the country; and that it is the interest of the United States, under existing circumstances, to become independent of foreign Powers for every national and domestic purpose; and earnestly impressed with the conviction that, not only the wealth, but the independence and security of the country are materially connected with the prosperity of manufactures, and that the establishment of them, by the adoption of a sound tariff, would increase the general stock of useful and productive labor, secure a steady and more extensive domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil, and improve the state, and advance the interests of agriculture, thereby promoting the general prosperity of the nation, and strengthening the bond of union by the ties of mutual interest and dependence: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, That the Senators of this State in the Senate of the United States be, and they are hereby, instructed, and the Representatives of this State in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested, to exert their influence, in establishing a tariff for the protection of our domestic manufactures and agricultural interests.

"Be it further resolved, That the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress."

The preamble and resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

INDIANA RESOLUTIONS—ROAD.

Mr. NOBLE communicated the following preamble and resolutions from the Legislature of Indiana, viz:

"Whereas the construction of the National road from Wheeling to the river Mississippi, and the completion of the same, would greatly tend to the union of the States, and would also be of great and lasting benefit to this State, and to the several States through which the same is intended to run; and whereas we believe, that the completion of said road would enhance the value of the lands owned by the General Government in the Western States, and would add to the importance of those States, and form the best and brightest link in the chain which binds us together: Wherefore,

"Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the completion of the National road, from Wheeling to the Mississippi river, is a work of great and general importance to the Union, and to the Western States.

"Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and our Senators instructed, to use their exertions to effect the completion of said road, by obtaining from Congress a donation of land, or appropriation of money, for that purpose: and that his Excellency the Governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress."

The preamble and resolutions were read, and referred to the select Committee on Roads and Canals.

MILITARY ROAD.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, Mr. RUGGLES in the Chair, took up for consideration the bill to authorize the making of a military road from Fort St. Philip, on the river Mississippi, to the English Turn, as an auxiliary to the defence of New Orleans.

Mr. JACKSON said that, as it was objected to this bill, when it was before under discussion, that it involved the question of the Constitutional power of Congress to make roads, he was, therefore, about to propose an amendment which would obviate the objection. He believed that the right of Congress to make roads upon its own lands, for military purposes, could hardly be doubted. It was as evident as the right of any individual to dispose of his property for his own purposes. Mr. J. then submitted an amendment, proposing to limit the road to Johnson's plantation, instead of extending it to the English Turn; thus confining it to the lands owned by the United States.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. HOLMES of Maine, postponed, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

OFFICERS OF CONGRESS.

On motion of Mr. SEYMOUR, the bill reported by the Committee on the Contingent Fund of the Senate, as an amendment to that introduced by Mr. EATON, to revive and continue in force an act fixing the compensation of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The amendment proposes that the Clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate shall be appointed in such manner as the Senate may, from time to time, prescribe; instead of vesting the appointment, by law, as it has been, in the hands of the Secretary. After a long discussion, on this point, by Messrs. SEYMOUR, HAYNE, LOWRIE, JOHNSON of Kentucky, HOLMES of Maine, LANMAN, MILLS, CHANDLER, PARROTT, BROWN of Ohio, and LLOYD of Massachusetts, this part of the amendment was rejected.

In the course of the remarks made by Mr. LOWRIE, he took occasion to express himself in terms of high commendation in regard to the present clerks in the Secretary's office. He had very frequently had occasion to call upon them, for the examination of the journals and documents appertaining to their office, and he had as frequently witnessed the assiduity and propriety with which their duties were performed.

After some further remarks by Mr. EATON, the bill, as amended, was reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the building of an additional number of sloops of war for the naval service of the United States, together with the amendments proposed thereto; Mr. RUGGLES, in the Chair; and, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 6.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the President and Directors of the Washington and Alexandria Turnpike Company, reported a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act for the establishment of a Turnpike Company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

The resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr.

LLOYD, of Maryland, directing the Secretary of the Senate to pay the funeral expenses of Mr. Samuel Turner, jr., the late principal clerk in the Secretary's office, was read the second time. Mr. L. stated, that it had been the usual practice of both Houses of Congress to pay the expenses attending the interment of their officers. He moved to fill the blank in the resolution with "one hundred dollars;" which was agreed to, and the resolution passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

ADDITIONAL SLOOPS OF WAR.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize the building of ten additional sloops of war. The question was stated to be, upon filling the blank for the appropriation, with "$425,000, annually, for two years."

Mr. BARBOUR rose in support of the bill. He believed the Senate could not, at present, feel any listlessness in regard to the Navy of the country. There had formerly been a difference of opinion on the subject of the United States becoming a maritime Power; and Mr. B. said he did justice to the honorable member from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) for the firmness he had always evinced, in his uniform support of the Navy, although that course had, at one time, separated him from the party with which he was accustomed to act. But it was due to those who had formerly differed in opinion from that honorable gentleman, to say, that experience had not then proved the necessity of a naval force; that, upon recurring to the history of other nations, particularly of that nation with whom we were then, unhappily, involved in difficulties, it was then hardly to be hoped that any effort of ours would be sufficient to enable us to make any stand, among the nations of the earth, as a naval Power; and it was firmly believed, by those who then opposed the progress of our Navy, that we should only build vessels to be captured. But, in the progress of time, the war came on; it furnished a trial of our capacity, as a maritime Power; and the decision has been such as to produce an uniform opinion, in the nation, that it is the duty of the Government to cherish this important means of our defence. In the brilliancy and the glory of its exploits, the Navy had far exceeded the utmost anticipation of its friends, and certainly it had surpassed the expectations of its opponents. While it had been thought that the land alone would be the theatre of our victories, it became sometimes the scene of our defeat, and even of our disgrace. And, where it was expected that we should meet with nothing but disaster, there the national character had been elevated. It was ascertained, in that war, that our Navy would furnish us with the greatest means of annoyance against an enemy, and that it would carry an impression of our power more than any other force we could furnish, and consequently the feeling towards it had been changed. Attachment to the Navy was now, Mr. B. said, confined to no particular part of the country—it was universal. Immediately after the war, at a moment when the nation was laboring under all the embarrassments resulting from the contest; when, individually and collectively, the country was distressed in its financial concerns; in April, 1816, a law was passed appropriating one million annually to the gradual increase of the Navy. Mr. B. said he had mentioned that fact, only to call the attention of the Senate to the circumstances of the Government at that time. If a million of dollars, annually, was then appropriated, when the nation was embarrassed, and individuals were involved in pecuniary distress, surely at this time, when our debt is diminished, and our population increased, we may provide for the increase of the Navy proposed by this bill. Either the appropriation at that time was the most unwise prodigality, or the bill proposed at this time could not fairly be objected to. Another fact might be stated. About three years since, in 1821, instead of the annual appropriation of a million of dollars, only five hundred thousand dollars were appropriated. This diminution did not grow out of any hostility to the Navy, but from the peculiar exigency in which the nation was situated at that time. We were constrained to borrow money for the ordinary expenditures of the Government. But that exigency has now passed away, and the circumstances that then existed have passed away with it. If, then, the question were now to be decided, whether the appropriation of a million a year, for eight years, should be made, as in 1816; if that question were before an American Senate, would there be any difference of opinion in regard to it? Has the public mind undergone any change in favor of a different policy? Is the increase of the Navy less desirable than at that time? Do not the same reasons that influenced the Government then, operate as strongly now; or is any one prepared to say that our Navy is as large as is desirable?

Mr. B. said he well recollected the reasons that were urged in favor of an increase of the Navy then, and he believed them fit and proper to be adverted to at this time. If there was really any change in public sentiment, it might not be improper to look back and consider whether those reasons might not produce the same effects now. Let us not think that we shall always enjoy peace. This may have a benumbing influence upon the country. If it is true that it is not necessary to make any expenditures more than your present service requires, all that you have done since the war is in vain; your fortifications, your cannon, the increase of your Navy, is all a useless waste of the public money, and it is better to stop instantly; but if the necessity of preparing for our defence continues as strong as it has been, it is better not to fold our arms, and cry peace, peace, when, peradventure, there is no peace. It was then contended that, if any country ought to cherish its navy, the United States ought to do so; that the extent of its maritime coast, the numerous tributary streams that intersect the country in every direction, furnishing facilities for the attacks of an enemy, required this means of defence. When the geographical situation of the country was considered, it was necessary. During the late war, Mr. B. said, his situation had brought the importance of this subject particularly to his view. The State of Virginia was intersected by numerous and large rivers, contributing to the beneficial intercourse of the inhabitants, in time of peace, but in war, furnishing high roads to the enemy from which to make their incursions upon the country. Thousands of the citizens of that State were detailed to protect its shores. The enemy was constantly changing his position, and rendered any defence almost impossible. One single ship, at the mouth of the Potomac, hermetically sealed the commerce of Virginia, Maryland, and a part of North Carolina. The expense of the protection of that part of the country was much greater than if it had been protected by a competent maritime force, independently of the thousands of our valuable citizens who perished in garrison. Mr. B. said he was better informed of the situation of Virginia, at that time, than of any other State; but he believed that other maritime States were in a similar situation. In another war, the same horrors might be sustained, if this arm of national defence were not strengthened.

It was said, furthermore, at that time, that, when reference was had to the particular genius of our Government, encouragement should be extended to the growth of the Navy. It would have a tendency to do away, in some measure, the necessity of standing armies. The whole history of nations has shown that standing armies were the surest enemies of liberty. England is indebted for the liberty and the extensive commerce which she enjoys to her naval, rather than her land forces. In every nation in which standing armies had been confided in, the liberties of the people had been subverted; and when maritime force had been relied upon, the contrary effect had generally been produced; and so, when we return to the United States, the necessity is obvious, of employing this species of force in preference to any other.

A third topic upon which encouragement of the Navy was defended, was, that it was friendly to the union of the States. It had been his misfortune, Mr. B. said, to hear subjects discussed there, which were exceedingly unpleasant; and, in which, one part of the Union had been set in contradistinction to another, as having been the theatre of signal victories; but, as it regards the Navy, these invidious distinctions cannot take place. The Navy is the property of the Union; and in whatever part of the Union we are situated we all share in its glory. All participate in the victories of the ocean. It does away all local considerations; and when the Navy grows up, as he trusted it would, to become a means of great annoyance to any enemy that might attack us, its advantages will be so obvious that every man will consider it as national property; and, in such a point of view, it would operate as a strong inducement to every State to preserve its connexion with the Union. These points were urged in favor of the Navy, at the close of the war; and the money was cheerfully voted to increase it. Then, our naval victories were fresh in recollection. We felt what a powerful annoyance it was to the enemy; and considered it a duty to appropriate money for its increase. And should we then, for the sake of saving a little money, say that the Navy had arrived at that point, beyond which its increase was unnecessary and prodigal? When the geographical situation, the policy, and a reference to our political connexion, point out its importance? These were the reasons that were then urged in favor of extending the naval system. But, whatever might have been the opinions of gentlemen upon the general view of the subject, Mr. B. trusted they would not fail to agree to this special increase of the Navy. Early in the present session a resolution had been submitted calling for information on the subject. The Secretary of the Navy, the organ of the Government, aided by three gentlemen of high standing in that department, had expressed his opinion in favor of the necessity of building the vessels provided for in this act; it was stated that the good of the service required them; that they furnished the best means of educating and instructing our officers; and that they were requisite to answer peculiar purposes for which vessels are, at present, wanted. These reasons were furnished from the head of the Navy Department, and the distinguished men who assist in the duties of that office; and coming from such authority, they ought to have great weight. They are also supported by the opinions of gentlemen whose particular situation furnishes the means of practical knowledge on the subject, and who are better advised upon it than others who have not had occasion to inquire into it. We learn, therefore, from persons entitled to respect, the necessity that these vessels should be built. An honorable member from Maine has asserted that we are called upon to-day to build small vessels, and to-morrow large ones; so that we keep increasing our Navy, while the only reason assigned is, that we want vessels of a different size. Mr. B. apprehended that, in building the vessels contemplated by this act, the Government would only restore this class of vessels to its original number, as it stood formerly. At one time we had thirteen of them, and now there were only four. If it was proper, then, that there should be thirteen vessels of this class, how much more necessary is it now, when the proportion of large vessels is increased? If gentlemen would advert to the navies of other nations, particularly to that of Great Britain, they would find the proportion of large vessels to be only about one-half. Of upwards of seven hundred vessels in the British Navy, more than one-half are of smaller grade than frigates. In the United States Navy, the small vessels bear no proportion to the large ones. If, therefore, we are governed by the naval policy of Great Britain, we shall keep up the proportion of small vessels; and this act merely proposes to maintain that due proportion which ought always to exist. These smaller class of vessels furnish a fine theatre for our masters commandant to prepare for the command of vessels of a larger size. If we neglect to build them, we shall be left, in time of war, to regret the want of them; and, instead of victory, to weep over our defeat. No one, Mr. B. said, was more disposed to a wise economy than himself; he had not now to learn that money was a necessary sinew of war; and, therefore, a proper economy would always have his support. But, he conceived that there was a difference between such economy, and withholding the necessary means for the defence of the country. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said, that he was not willing to go to this extent, in the increase of the Navy, in time of peace; but, if we do not increase it in time of peace, when shall we do it? When the nation is involved in war, it is surely a most improvident time to do it. If, then, we are not to increase our naval force in time of peace, and it is not proper to do it in war, there is an end of the Navy at once. He would ask his honorable friend, what was the result of experience on this subject?

Mr. LOWRIE rose to explain. He had been misunderstood, both by the gentleman from Virginia, and, the other day, by the gentleman from South Carolina. They had attributed to him sentiments which he did not entertain. He had said that he was not willing, in a single year, and in time of peace, to build as many as ten vessels of this class, merely to be used in time of war. He would not appropriate so much money in one year, if the vessels were wanted for war only. He was quite willing to fill the chasm which existed in this class of vessels, but not to do it at once, when the finances of the country were in no better situation than at present.

Mr. BARBOUR resumed. He had no disposition to misrepresent the gentleman. He thought the present, however, the most acceptable time for building the vessels in question. He wished to call the attention of the Senate to the experience furnished by the last war. It was made a matter of boasting, that in sixty days the trees of the forest were converted into vessels, and floating upon the water. And what was the result? The Secretary of the Navy now tells you how worthless they were. If the necessity of this kind of force had been felt previous to the war, the materials might have been properly selected, and prepared, and the vessels have been still in existence, and fit for service; but, as it was, they perished almost as soon as built. Six weeks brought them into existence, and six weeks carried them to the bottom of the Lakes, or rendered them useless. In time of war, there are no surplus funds to build vessels with. All the funds that the nation can raise, are put in requisition for other purposes. And before the vessels are built, the necessity which called for them may have passed away. These vessels are wanted for a particular service. Under the necessity of the case, the last Congress passed an act for the purchase of additional vessels. They were not of suitable kind for the service. The men were exposed on board of them to the diseases of the climate in which they were used, and perished in large numbers. They proved so many graves for the men employed in them, and, in the language of the Secretary, they were unfavorable to discipline. This particular kind of vessels, therefore, is necessary in the service. It will actually promote economy, instead of being an useless expense, to build them. They are superior, in point of size, for the service. We send ships-of-the-line, or frigates, on distant service, to carry Ministers, &c., where these vessels would answer the purpose equally as well, and be supported at much less expense. In wars with the pirates, they are particularly serviceable. It is said that the pirates are put down; but the seeds remain there still; although they are partly suppressed, yet, as evil weeds grow up apace, so may they appear again. In reference to particular waters which they occupy, this smaller class of vessels is called for, to exterminate these frightful banditti. But we are told that we shall have to borrow money. A gentleman who stands in a near relation to the Treasury, as chairman of the Committee of Finance, says that we shall have to borrow money, if we vote this appropriation. Although I appreciate his services, yet this statement has almost counteracted the support which he gave to the bill. It will be difficult to quiet the alarm caused by such an assertion. But, Mr. B. thought, there could be no danger of being obliged to borrow—that there was a balance in the Treasury of $9,000,000, on the first of January. Subject this sum to what deductions you can, there will still be an excess of many millions, beyond our ordinary expenditures, which are to be applied to the payment of the national debt.

If we vote these $425,000 for two years, we shall not have so much to pay on account of our debts, to be sure; but why have to borrow money? We shall only pay so much the less—and are your creditors very anxious to be paid? No: There is not an individual who holds your scrip, that would not wish that you should keep the money. So long as your stock is ten per cent. above par, who will ask you for payment? The question, then, is whether these vessels will advance the interests of the country, equal to the sacrifice they require. Are we willing the growth of the Navy should go on? If we build ships, we must pay the money for them. His honorable friend from North Carolina, who often told plain truth there, had told an anecdote, which, Mr. B. said, now recurred to his recollection, of a man who was determined to become a man of quality—but he did not like to spare the money necessary for such a purpose; his wife, who understood the business better, told him, that, if he would be quality he must buy the silver spoons. Now, if we will be a maritime Power, we must spare the money necessary for it. If we believe that our geographical situation and our political relations require this sort of force—if we recollect the brilliant achievements of the war, and think that a navy is necessary to protect the country, and sustain its reputation, it is in vain to tell of the money it will require. There is no need of prodigality, when we can peaceably and silently increase our naval force. We do not wish to place it on a footing with that of Great Britain, but only that it should gradually "grow with our growth, and strengthen with our strength"—that it should increase with the resources of the country. To so interesting an object as this, what is the $425,000, annually? If Great Britain had been governed by such considerations, would she ever have had a navy, which has almost enabled her to hold the destinies of the world in her hand? No nation has ever held such power as she has acquired by means of her navy. If Great Britain says that Greece shall be free, she will probably be so. If she says that the Allied Powers must not interfere with the concerns of South America, is there one of them that will dare to do it? Wherever the winds blow, and the waters flow, her naval power is felt. But, Mr. B. said, he did not wish to be understood as advocating an increase of our Navy to that extent.

He understood the question now to be, upon filling the blank in the bill, with an appropriation of $425,000, annually, for two years. He thought it would be advantageous to make the appropriation, and leave the business in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, with a view to give time for purchasing and preparing the materials—that the timber might be seasoned, &c. If $425,000, for one year only, were voted, it would build but five vessels; and in a short time, Congress would be called upon to pass another act on the subject. He hoped the motion to fill the blank would prevail, and the whole appropriation be made.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, said he had regretted that the bill now under consideration had been so long delayed, as he had feared that the strong impression made by the arguments of the honorable chairman (and his colleagues) of the Committee on Naval Affairs, might, by that delay, have lost something of its force. But, since he had heard the able and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) in support of the bill, he felt that we had been amply compensated for the delay which had taken place. Mr. H. said he felt it to be his duty to yield his support, (however feeble it might be,) to this bill, because he had not only advocated it in the committee of which he was a member, but most cordially approved of the policy on which it was founded; and though he was not destined to partake largely in the honors of victory, (should the measure succeed,) yet he would certainly feel his full share of mortification at its defeat. He trusted, therefore, that the Senate would bear with him while he endeavored to remove some of the objections which had been urged against the bill, and to show, affirmatively, the policy of building the proposed number of sloops of war, as soon as materials could be prepared for that purpose.

The first objection against the bill was advanced by the honorable gentleman from Maine, (Mr. CHANDLER.) He had endeavored to give our little fleet "a shot between wind and water." He had attacked it with satire, which, in a skilful hand, is sometimes a better weapon than argument. He tells us that the friends of the Navy, at one moment, insist "that we have too few ships of the line—the next, that we have too few 'frigates'—and then we are told that we have too few 'sloops of war;' and then, that, in the increase of our Navy, we are travelling in a circle to which there is no end. With all due deference to that honorable gentleman, (said Mr. H.) I submit that the course of which he complains, is the only one which could have been pursued, or by which we can ever arrive at a suitable Naval Establishment. A navy is, in its very nature, progressive; this great engine of national defence can be constructed only by gradual means. It must "grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength." It has been well asked, by my honorable friend from Massachusetts, whether the gentleman who makes this objection would, in the construction of his dwelling, expect that the chambers and the garret would be built at the same moment with the cellar? And I, (said Mr. H.) will put another case, and ask whether, if he employed an agent to improve a farm, he would object that he had first prepared for cultivation a small field, and then a large one—or whether he would not discover, in this gradual and progressive improvement, the evidence of increasing wealth and prosperity? But, if the honorable gentleman's objections really be not to the increase of the Navy, but only to the manner in which that object was accomplished, he would suggest that he ought not to oppose the bill, but should offer to amend it, so as to embrace the construction of vessels of every class at the same time. Mr. H. feared, however, that such a proposition would never meet with the approbation of the gentleman from Maine, much less that it would be proposed by him.

A further objection had been advanced by the honorable member from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) in the form of a complaint, "that money was never suffered to remain long in the Treasury;" and he tells us "that the Navy is the key by which the Treasury is unlocked." It is a golden key, sir, said Mr. H., which, if it unlocks the Treasury, also opens the door to national glory. May the Treasury never be unlocked for any purpose less conducive to the welfare and honor of our country! I have never, said Mr. H., been able to comprehend the nature of the satisfaction which gentlemen appear to feel in the contemplation of the Treasury, filled with gold and silver, and locked up from the public use. I prefer, said Mr. H., to see the public money expended in great national improvements; in establishments calculated to advance the true interests and welfare of the whole people. The gentleman has himself urged an argument which makes against his position. He says, it is the habit of the country to exhaust every dollar which comes into the Treasury, and that this always has been, and ever will be the case. If this be true, ought we not, by a judicious and timely appropriation of the balances in the Treasury, to prevent a worse use from being made of it? If we are in the habit of spending all our money, it is certainly best to spend it for wise purposes. If money is to remain idle in the Treasury, Mr. H. thought it had better have remained in the pockets of the citizens.

The next objection comes from the honorable chairman of the Committee of Finance, (Mr.

SMITH,) a gentleman entitled to the highest respect, as well from his situation, as the guardian of our finances, as from his great experience. While I return him, said Mr. H., my thanks for the good feeling he has expressed towards the Navy, I cannot but regret that he has urged an objection which, I fear, may go to the destruction of this bill. He has drawn rather a gloomy picture of the condition of our finances, and seems to think that we are not in a situation to afford the appropriation called for by this bill. The honorable gentleman began by stating emphatically that "money is power," an axiom which, I fear, has had more influence on his mind, on the present occasion, than it is probably entitled to. The celebrated aphorism of Lord Bacon, that "knowledge is power," if applied to nations, would seem to teach us to seek for national power, not in the accumulation of silver or of gold, but in the improvement, the intelligence, and virtue—in short, in the moral character of the people. Spain, with the mines of Mexico and Peru at her command, was poor and powerless, while Great Britain, overwhelmed with debt, and incapable of converting her paper into gold, was rich in her great national institutions, and in the prosperous condition of her agriculture, her commerce, and her manufactures. No, sir, it is not money, it is not in the mere accumulation of cash in the Treasury, but it is the resources of a nation which constitute national power. These consist in the prosperous condition of all the great national institutions of a country, in the accumulated capital in the hands of individuals, in the productive labor of the country, in the improvements in science and the arts, and, above all, in the moral habits and principles of the people. Money, converted into ships of war, is, said Mr. H., of more real value than money locked up in the Treasury. The gentleman from Massachusetts assures us that, should we turn merchants, and sell our ships, they would bring more than they cost. But, in a national point of view, as the source of power, vessels of war, built, equipped, and ready for service, are much more valuable than money. A navy contains more of the elements of strength, and is every way superior to money, as it contributes more to the character of the nation abroad, and its dignity at home, and affords greater protection to the property and persons of our citizens.

But, said Mr. H., let us look, for a moment, into the actual state of our finances, and see if it offers any obstacle to the passage of this bill. The President, in his Message, informed us that there was a surplus in the Treasury of nine millions of dollars. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury reduces this balance to six millions, on the ground that there were appropriations to the amount of three millions, which had not been called for. We are not informed of the items which compose the sum, and it is very probable that a great portion of it may never be called for. But, should it be otherwise, it must be recollected, there always must be a part of the appropriations of every year unexpended at the end of the year. The gentleman himself had informed us, that this had been uniformly the case for twenty years. Mr. H. submitted, therefore, that it was not altogether correct to say that we might be compelled to borrow money for the current expenses of the next year, when the calculations were predicated on the idea, that the whole amount of the appropriations, for that year, as well as the unexpended appropriations of the last year, would be expended within the year, when, in point of fact, no such occurrence had taken place for the last twenty years, nor, indeed, in the whole history of the Government. With respect to the act which has been passed during the present session, for the redemption of the seven per cent. stock, Mr. H. conceived that it would of course be proper to redeem it by the issue, whenever called for, of an equal amount of five per cent. stock. The debt was not yet due, and if, in consequence of our having, at this time, an unemployed surplus in the Treasury, we proposed to redeem this stock now, that surely could not be urged as a proof of a deficiency in the revenue. The public debt, at this time, exceeds eighty millions, and, by redeeming it before it becomes due, we might deprive ourselves of the means of paying the ordinary expenses of the Government. You may apply the surplus in the Treasury to redeem your stock before it is redeemable, and, by premiums, (as in this case,) may induce the holders to surrender it; but you will take this step with the understanding that stock to the same amount, but bearing a less interest,) must be issued when the exigencies of the country shall demand it. Mr. H. said, he was not perfectly satisfied with the estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the revenue of the present year. He had estimated the receipts by customs at sixteen millions and a half, while the receipts, during the last year, from the same source, had been twenty-one millions, and he did not think the reasons given were very satisfactory, as they would go to prove that, in a few years, we would have no revenue at all. But perhaps it was wise, in estimating revenue, to take the worst view of the subject. But, Mr. H. said, he would not enter further into calculations on a subject with which he did not profess to be well acquainted. There can be no doubt, said he, that the United States can afford to build ten sloops of war at a time when we are anticipating the payment of our debts; and your creditors, so far from pressing their demands, are entreating you to suffer their money to remain in your hands. If this bill, therefore, be expedient; if its passage be called for by the interests of the country, he had no fears but that the means would be very easily provided. He would put the bill into the hands of the chairman of the Committee of Finance, and call on him to provide the money. He knew that it was a call which would be complied with.

I come now, said Mr. H., to examine the argument of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LOWRIE.) He had asked if these sloops of war were wanted for immediate service? and had stated that, on looking back to the reports of the Secretary of the Navy, for several years past, he had discovered that all our sloops of war had not been constantly in commission; from which fact, he seems to doubt the necessity of adding to the number, at this time, or at least of building so many as ten. In answer to this objection, I would remark, said Mr. H., that every well ordered Naval Establishment must consist of vessels in commission and vessels in ordinary—of ships to be employed in time of peace, and those to be employed in time of war. The number of vessels necessary for service, even in peace, must always exceed the number usually kept in commission at any one time. The Peace Establishment must be equal to all the exigencies of commerce. We must be prepared to send a fleet to the Mediterranean, to South America, to the Northwest coast, to India, and to the West Indies, though the service of this year, or the next, may not require all these stations to be occupied. The present year calls for the service of all our sloops of war, and they are all in commission—the last year one of them was in ordinary. But, if the number always kept in actual service, is to be the standard, our Navy would be small indeed. The last year, for instance, we had in service only one seventy-four, and two frigates; and this year we will not have more. This is no test, however, of the number necessary for a Peace Establishment. But the honorable gentleman says he is willing to increase the Navy, but he thinks this bill ought to be engrafted on the general bill on that subject. This, sir, said Mr. H., is, in substance, exactly what we propose to do. The laws already provide for building seventy-fours and frigates, and we propose now to make a similar provision for sloops of war. This bill, said Mr. H., will make the system complete. He hoped, after having gone so far in the good work of providing an efficient Navy, we would not now stop short. It was from small beginnings, that the greatest results were often produced. I recollect, said Mr. H., in the course of my early reading, to have been forcibly struck by a remark of Lord Coke, in which he congratulates the English nation on two things, which, he says, constitute their pride and their glory; the first was, in the possession of their “Virgin Queen—the Queen,” as he quaintly expresses it, “of ‘roseate beauty,’ in whose cheeks ‘were united the white rose and the red—as she ‘united in her person the conflicting claims of the ‘houses of York and Lancaster.’” The second was, in their magnificent fleet, which, said he, “consists of no less than thirty-three ships.” Such, said Mr. H., was the British navy in the days of Queen Elizabeth—and what is it now!

I proceed now, (continued Mr. H.,) to show the propriety of passing this bill. This will naturally lead to a brief examination of the policy on which it is founded, as well as of its particular details. I admit, sir, said Mr. H., that this is not a war measure, and that our proposition is not founded on the present aspect of our foreign relations. I trust that, were we now about to adopt a system of measures looking to a war with any European Power, the nature and extent of our preparations would bear some proportion to the magnitude of the object. The Naval Committee would not, in such a case, merely propose to build ten sloops of war. When America speaks in the language of warning or defiance, she must be heard; when she acts, she must be felt. There was a time, sir, when the complaints of our country were heard in Europe with coldness, nay, with contempt, and when our threatenings were received with incredulity. Yes; it was incredible in Europe, that the United States could be urged by injuries or insults to support our commerce, to protect our citizens, or to vindicate our honor. The last war has happily wiped off that stain from our character. There is a debt of gratitude which we will never be able to pay, due to the Legislators who declared that war—to the statesmen who conducted it—but, above all, to the heroes who, on the land and the sea, brightened our path by their victories, in the darkest hour of our national history. Ten years ago, we had a character to gain—now, we have one to support.

But though, said Mr. H., I admit that this bill is not founded on the expectation of any immediate change of the peaceful relations of the United States with foreign Powers, yet the present state of the world seems to admonish us to look carefully into all our institutions; to rectify abuses; to purify and strengthen our establishments; to make them all soul—all energy. When war is waged by the confederated monarchs against liberal principles, all over the earth; when free institutions are everywhere proscribed, and human rights and human happiness are trampled in the dust, can “the last Republic” be an indifferent spectator of the scene? We are not yet called upon, it is true, “to put on our armor, or assume an attitude” for war, but it certainly behoves us to examine our Military and Naval Establishments; to introduce stricter and more perfect discipline; to establish order, economy, and accountability; to give harmony and proportion to all the parts; in short, to make them more useful in peace, and more efficient in war. This bill is the first of a series which have been reported by the Naval Committee, having in view these objects. If it be admitted that ours is a naval policy, it seems to follow, that our establishment should be rendered as perfect as possible.

That it is the true policy of the United States “to provide and maintain a navy,” (to be limited in its extent only by the wants and resources of the country,) seems now to be too generally admitted, to require proof by elaborate argument. The doubts which once existed on this subject, have been dispelled by experience, and the Navy has “fought itself into favor.” I will trespass, however, said Mr. H., so far on the patience of the Senate, as to recall some of the considerations by which the wisdom of our naval policy is demonstrated. The United States of America must always be a commercial country. With a sea-coast of two thousand miles, and numerous and large rivers, (opening the channels of commerce almost to the mountains,) with a vast quantity of rich and uncultivated lands—our great facilities for trade—and, above all, the character and habits of the people—how can our pursuits be other than commercial? But commerce invites aggression, and requires protection; and that protection can only be afforded by a navy. In proof of these positions, I will offer only two arguments. The first is found in the deliberate opinion of General WASHINGTON, who, in his last speech, made to Congress in 1797, declares, “that, to an active external commerce, the protection of a naval force is indispensable;” and concludes his argument by the remark, “that these considerations invite the United States to look to the means, and to set about the gradual creation of a navy.” My second argument is found in depredations committed on our commerce, from the period of the French Revolution down to the year 1812. The President informs us that the amount of property lost by us during that period, is “incalculable;” whole fleets were captured and confiscated. I hazard little, sir, in declaring that the millions which we have lost by these depredations, could have furnished a navy which would have afforded adequate protection to our trade. The opinion of General WASHINGTON, with these facts added to it, would seem sufficient to convince us of the necessity of a navy. A navy is also necessary for defence; it is our most efficient mode of defence. Your fortifications are stationary; but the naval force can be moved from place to place, as it is wanted. Its moveable character renders it most powerful and effectual. A navy, in case of war, will enable you to carry the contest into the enemy’s country—to attack him on the ocean. With the exception of Canada, how are we to invade the territory of any nation? It is only by means of a navy that you can make Europe feel your force. The history of the world, from the days of Scipio and Hannibal, to those of Napoleon, fully proves that the wisest of all policy, in war, is to remove it from your own shores. This furnishes an essential use for a navy. History would afford some valuable lessons on this subject. But, sir, I have not time to dwell upon them. If we look into the history of Genoa, of Venice, of Holland, and of England, and seek the causes of their power, their navies will be found to have been eminently instrumental in its acquisition and preservation. Where would Great Britain have been, at this time, if it had not been for her navy? She would have been subdued by the arms of France.

The growing Powers of South America, also, demand our attention. They will, undoubtedly, build up navies, and our future concerns with them may require that we should pursue the same policy.

I come now, said Mr. H., to consider the particular provision of this bill, which proposes to add to our Navy ten sloops of war. This measure is necessary to preserve a due proportion between our large and small vessels. The laws now provide for twelve ships-of-the-line, fifteen frigates, and only four sloops of war. In the year 1813, four seventy-fours, six forty-fours, and six sloops were authorized to be built. In 1816, the number of seventy-fours was increased to twelve, and the frigates to fifteen, but no provision was made for sloops of war. The object of the present bill is to remedy that defect. It cannot be doubted that the number of our sloops of war should, at least, equal that of our frigates. Such is the state of the British navy, the result of the experience of the greatest naval Power in the world. The passage of this bill is also recommended by a due regard to economy. The Secretary of the Navy informs us "that sloops of war are competent to most of the objects for which our Navy is employed in time of peace, and often save the necessity of keeping in commission vessels of a larger class." Nearly four sloops of war can be built for the cost of one ship-of-the-line, and three of the former can be nearly supported for what it costs to maintain the latter. It is true economy, therefore, to build sloops of war, as it will enable us to lay up in ordinary our larger vessels. It is said that the appropriation called for is too large to be made in a single year, or even in two years. Sir, we know that all of these vessels cannot be built in one, perhaps in two years. But, if we are convinced that the number of vessels is not too large, why not make the appropriation at once? The appropriation of the money will not cause a premature expenditure of it. If the vessels cannot be built immediately, the means will be afforded to make contracts, and to provide and prepare the materials. We cannot tell, precisely, how many may be built within the year; but, if a sufficient sum of money be appropriated, they can be completed as may be found convenient. The last and most important consideration remains. These vessels are highly necessary for the improvement of that valuable class of our officers, the masters commandant, of which we have about thirty. These men constitute our best resource in times of emergency. Your post captains are prepared at any time for command, but the masters commandant are kept only in subordinate situations, and have not the opportunity to acquire experience in the duties which they may be called in time of war to perform. What constitutes a Navy? Is it the ships? Is it the mere timber, iron, and sails? No. It is the skill and experience of the officers, and the character of our sailors. The seamen, indeed, may acquire a knowledge of their duties in the ordinary course of trade, but it is not so with your officers.

In time of war your masters commandant will be promoted, and will you give them the command of your frigates when they have not been accustomed to separate commands? What was the situation of Bonaparte in this respect? He wanted a navy; he could have built ships with the resources of the Continent at his command; but he could not create officers and seamen. He was, therefore, constantly controlled in all his operations by the British navy. It is the best policy to make these officers perfect in skill and in discipline. They are men of high character and chivalrous spirit; they are already disciplined as far as their opportunities permit; but they are not accustomed to independent command. In this point of view the building of these vessels is of importance to the nation; sloops of war will give command to your masters commandant.

I need not repeat the remarks of the honorable member from Massachusetts, on the superior value of this kind of vessels, in certain branches of the service. He has sufficiently shown their peculiar application to the West India service, and their use in hovering about the coasts of an enemy in time of war. It will be recollected in what manner the Wasp kept the British channel during the late war, in defiance of the whole British navy; and the services of the Argus cannot be forgotten. Nor have the services of sloops of war been less important in building up the naval glory of the country. The picture drawn by the gentleman from Massachusetts, on this subject, might be injured, but could not be improved, by any thing I could say. But, in relation to the effect produced abroad by the exploits of our Navy, he would take the liberty of mentioning an anecdote to be found in the history of the French Emperor. While a prisoner at St. Helena, a conversation took place between Napoleon and the British surgeon, which turned on the American navy—a navy which had once been described as a "few fir-built ships, with bits of striped bunting at the mast-head." The Emperor expressed his deliberate conviction, founded on the events of the late war, that the American navy was superior to the British. This, the surgeon, with a becoming esprit du corps, firmly denied, but his arguments could not shake the strong impression which had been made on the mind of the Emperor by our naval battles. The probability of a war between the United States and Spain next became the subject of conversation, when the English officer, (released from the trammels of professional opinion,) declared, in his turn, that there was no doubt that an American frigate was superior to a Spanish seventy-four.

Ought we not, then, (said Mr. H.), to cherish our navy? which not only affords protection in peace, and defence in war, but which has elevated, in the eyes of the world, our national character.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that if he had not laid it down as a rule that his judgment should not be carried away by the impulses of feeling, he should certainly go with the gentleman from South Carolina, in voting for the bill now before the Senate. But, admitting it were the object to build as many as ten of these vessels, he could not possibly see the necessity of appropriating all the money at this time. The timber for the vessels can only be got in the Winter season. The present Winter is too far advanced to do any thing towards it. Nothing can be done, as to procuring the materials, until the next Winter; and the building cannot be commenced until the Summer following. Before the materials can be collected, Congress will be again in session. If ten sloops of war are necessary, let them be built. But, Mr. C. said, he was not afraid to trust a future session of Congress, to judge according to the circumstances that might then exist. He was willing to fill up the blank with such a sum as would be adequate to the purchase of the timber.

Mr. SMITH rose.—He said he was aware of the disadvantage which a speaker was subjected to, who rose after a powerful display of eloquence; and he felt the inconvenience of following the gentleman from South Carolina. That gentleman, said Mr. S., has treated this subject in a masterly manner; and I have listened to him with peculiar attention. But, sir, who is there in this Senate, or in the United States, that is opposed to a navy? Who, that does not join, heart and hand, in its support? It has been before determined that this country shall be a naval Power. There is, surely, no necessity to impress the utility of a navy now. If a stranger were listening to our debates, he might be led, by the speeches of the gentleman from Virginia and South Carolina, to believe that there were some members of the Senate opposed to a navy—to this bulwark and defence of the country. It requires no eloquence to speak of its usefulness. It is a self-evident proposition. Every body perceives it; and yet gentlemen think it necessary to display their eloquence upon the subject. It might be thought, from some of the remarks that have fallen from the gentlemen, that I was opposed to this bill. Sir, I have always been in favor of a navy. It became my duty, as Chairman of the Committee on Finance, when a large sum of money was about to be appropriated, to state the situation of our finances. It was my duty to show that this large sum might perplex the finances of the country unnecessarily. The gentleman from Massachusetts had stated that there was a surplus in the Treasury, every year; and I thought it but fair to give to the Senate all the information I possessed on the subject. I do not agree with the gentleman, that we ought to count upon such a surplus. We know not how far the appropriations may be called for. We ought not to reckon upon a surplus, which is liable to be drawn out of the Treasury at any moment. With this opinion, I believed it my duty to take a brief view of the finances of the country, when so large a sum as $800,000 was to be appropriated, and to consider whether it would create any difficulty in the money concerns of the nation; and the view which I took has had some effect: for, it has induced the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to change the amount of his appropriation for the present year. If he will reduce it yet further, in order that it may come within the financial means of the year, I will vote for building the whole number of vessels proposed. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated that vessels built by contract will rot. And so, sir, will vessels built in any other way. Why, then, should we appropriate a sum of money, to build so many as ten vessels, in one year? Why should we appropriate it, when there can be no use for it? I wish the bill to be amended, so as to authorize the timber suitable for the vessels to be procured. If you say materials for the vessels, that includes cordage, nails, copper, &c. Those things can be purchased at any time; but the timber ought to be obtained, in order that it may be seasoned. I am in favor of building the ten vessels of this class, and have not the least objection to appropriate the money, as fast as they can be built. If it can be shown, that the money will be wanted within the present year, I am willing to vote it now. But, sir, you have no timber on hand, adequate to this object. If the timber for the ten ships is procured, we shall have the subject before us; and when we are told that the timber is ready, shall we not appropriate the money to build the vessels? I am confident of such a vote, and am willing to trust to its decision hereafter. I agree perfectly with the remarks on the necessity of these vessels, as furnishing the means of instruction to our young officers. Perhaps it would have been better, if the gentleman had not mentioned the number of those officers; for, it may, possibly, be objected by some, that we keep thirty masters commandant in service, and are now obliged to build vessels for them. There certainly could have been no better course than that which was adopted after the war, for the gradual increase of the Navy. In 1820, our finances became embarrassed; and the Secretary of the Navy himself proposed that the annual appropriation should be diminished. He stated that the Department could do with a less sum than a million of dollars; and it was, accordingly, reduced to five hundred thousand. In that act, there was no hostility evinced towards the Navy. The reduction took place in consequence of the situation of the country.

Mr. BARBOUR rose to explain. He certainly had not intended to impute the change of the appropriation, which took place in 1820, to any hostility to the Navy; he was aware that it grew out of the then embarrassed state of the national finances. But he thought a change of circumstances authorized a change of the policy which they called forth.

Mr. SMITH resumed. I believe all the members of the Senate agree upon the principle of this bill; some think that as many as ten vessels ought to be built; others, that five will be sufficient. As I was not opposed to the general principle, I had not prepared to discuss the subject; but hope gentlemen will consider these views of it. If the vessels are built quick they will rot, notwithstanding all the care that may be taken of them.

I do not intend to enter into a contest with the gentleman from South Carolina, in regard to the remark, that money is power. But, suppose you get your ships, sir, how can you manage them without money? Money is power; because it furnishes the means of building, manning, and supplying ships. I stated that, with the balance due to the Sinking Fund, there would be a deficiency of one million of dollars, on the first of January, 1825; but, sir, that was no argument against building these vessels; because, if they are really wanted, the money can be found to build them; but, then, there is no necessity of appropriating it, unless it is to be used. I believe the amount of money proposed cannot be used in one or two years; then why should it be appropriated? Sir, I admire the ardor and the zeal of the gentleman from South Carolina, but we must look at our means as we go along. The gentleman believes the Secretary has erred, on the side of prudence, in calculating that the revenue of the year will be less than that of the preceding year; and he has corrected the statement.

Mr. HAYNE explained. He only said, or intended to say, that he had reason to suppose that the revenue would exceed the calculations of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH continued. Some years since I examined the calculations of the Secretary, in regard to the revenue of the succeeding year, and convinced myself that he had much underrated it. And, what was still more unfortunate, sir, I succeeded in convincing the House of Representatives that he had underrated it. But the result proved that the calculation of the Secretary, at that time, rather exceeded the amount which was actually received into the Treasury. The fact is, that it is wholly impossible to make any correct estimate, when the revenue depends upon so many contingencies. But the safest way is to take the calculations of the Secretary of the Treasury. If the holders of the seven per cent. stock receive the payment proposed in the law passed this session, and my construction of the law in relation to the Sinking Fund is correct, there will be a deficiency in the revenue in 1825. Upon the construction of that law there are different opinions; if mine is false, then the Treasury will have ample means to meet all the demands against it; if correct, there will be a deficiency. The honorable gentleman charges me with taking the worst view of the subject; but, if my opinion of that law is right, it is the correct view, whether worst or not. Sir, I never, for the sake of opposition, take any view which I do not think correct. The gentleman says that Bonaparte was anxious to establish a navy, but could not do it for want of men; and may we not, possibly, find some difficulty in that respect? May we not be obliged to resort to other means, than are at present found necessary, to obtain men? Let us not follow the example of Great Britain, with her eight hundred ships of war. The comparison between Great Britain and our own country does not hold good. She has immense foreign possessions; her very heart's blood is away from her own shores. We ought not to think of fitting out a navy, to compete with the Powers of Europe. But we can establish such a navy as will be sufficient for our own protection; such an one as will enable us to speak a language that will be understood; such an one as will lead other nations to be cautious how they tread upon us; such an one, as, in case of war between France and England, will give Great Britain to know that we may even turn the scale against her. Our enterprise is equal to that of any other nation, and, for these purposes, our Navy may be a powerful instrument in our hands. I was unprepared, sir, to enter into this argument. If it is shown that the sum proposed to fill the blank in this bill, can really be spent for the contemplated purpose, I shall be willing to agree to the bill as it is.

Mr. MAÇON rose. He could not say, like the gentleman from Maryland, that he had always been in the right, in regard to this question respecting a navy; nor with the gentleman from Virginia, that he was yet quite convinced upon the subject. Changes of circumstances would be constantly occurring; we are sometimes very rich, and sometimes very poor. It is true the nation appears to be decidedly in favor of a navy. To be useful, a navy must be strong enough to make itself felt; it must be able to meet that of any other nation. I am not willing, said Mr. M., to join stocks with any nation. I am for standing solely upon American ground, and upon no other. I believe, in time of war, your navy will not be able to go on, without impressment. You must resort to impressment; you must embarrass your commerce; you must stop your privateering, in another war. The history of nations will show that their freedom had done more towards their success than any thing else. It was the freedom of England, more than the bayonets of Russia, that put down the Emperor of France. The character of one part of this country, to be sure, is commercial, and that of the other is not so. How long we shall continue a commercial people, we cannot tell. I fear the tariff, and some other projects, will convert us to something else. We are told that Lord Coke spoke of two great blessings which England possessed—her Queen and her Navy. We possess two greater blessings than these. We are as free as any people can be in civilized society, and every man has plenty to eat. I wish I could say that every one in the country was out of debt. I do not believe we are in such good circumstances as the gentleman from Virginia has described. The failure of the banks has been a great evil in the country. In all countries, I believe, (though I was never in any but my own,) nothing is so pleasing as military glory. I well remember, sir, how I loved, in my youth, to listen to stories of battles. It is the delight of men, and women too. This ardor for military glory is the bane of Republics. All history demonstrates that too much war has proved their destruction. I do not pretend to know much of military affairs; but I believe that men have a particular gift of God to perform great actions; it is a special gift, like that with which poets, and orators, and other celebrated men, are endowed. Men must have a natural turn of mind towards it in order to excel in any business. It is said that our extensive seacoast requires a navy. Great Britain has an extensive seacoast, and do we wish to have as much starvation and heavy taxes as she has? I had much rather that our people should have plenty to eat, than a brilliant navy. I entertain no hostility towards England; but, with all her enterprise and ingenuity, by water and by land, we still find her involved with a heavy debt. It is said that navies have added to the glory of nations. All the naval Powers that have existed, have fallen, with the exception of old John Bull. His landholders, and his handicraftsmen, have yet succeeded in keeping him up, and he is more free than any of them. Although I have never voted for a navy, not for a rope or a nail of it, yet I am willing to defend its honor; I was of that opinion, in regard to the affair of the Chesapeake. When any other nation attacks one of our ships, I would give them blow for blow.

Additional Sloops of War.

SENATE.

I do not like long appropriations, for I am quite willing to leave the business of voting money for future purposes, to our successors. It must be admitted that the naval question was settled by the late war. An appropriation was made for the increase of the Navy; and we had to reduce that appropriation one-half. We had better leave this business to those who come after us. We had that appropriation to reduce; and we may have to reduce this also. No navy can supersede the necessity of an army. Your fortifications must be kept in order, and manned. If any reverse in our situation takes place, we shall be compelled to resort to loans. No man can calculate what demands we may have for money. I shall use no hard words towards the Holy Alliance; hard words do not hurt them, and they do us no good. I am willing to be at peace with all the world, and not to abuse anybody.

Sir, I have heard of economy ever since I came into Congress, and every year we spend more and more money. I don't know but this all right, but I think the people are not as free from debt as they were in the days of Washington, and I believe the Government owes more than it did then. The gentleman from Virginia has alluded to my anecdote about the old man and his silver spoons. It might have been right for the old man to have the spoons, but, then, he had the money to buy them with. Some few years ago, sir, I was travelling in the southern part of the country, in a circuit through a part of South Carolina and Georgia—the land is not quite so poor there as it is with us, but still, no one, who had not seen it, would believe there was any land quite so poor upon earth. I stopped at a very miserable tavern; there were three or four persons present engaged in conversation. They were full of a Spanish war, and all in a rage for taking Cuba. They said, "we had beaten Great Britain once in a seven years' war; and again, in two years, and that it would be but a job before breakfast, to whip Spain and take Cuba from her." It is a very easy thing to get into a war. The people may be a little unwilling for it, at first, but some leading spirits get up an excitement, and then it is easily kept up. We are always trying some experiment. When the gunboat system was proposed, I was no advocate for it. I recollect making the remark, upon the occasion, that one British frigate would run over them all, as a fine race horse would run over a litter of Guinea pigs.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, was gratified to find that no objection had been yet urged against building the ships provided for in this bill. The only objection seemed to be to the amount of the appropriation. The Naval Committee certainly have no desire to press the subject upon the Senate. It is no child of theirs. An honorable member introduced a resolution, early in the session, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of building an additional number of sloops of war. In compliance with the instructions contained in that resolve, the committee proceeded to make the necessary inquiries. They communicated with the head of the Navy Department on the subject. It was his peculiar province to know what number was necessary. He answered to the question of the committee, that ten would be the proper number. This number did not originate with the committee. They inquired, also, what would be the expense, and they were told eighty-five thousand dollars for each vessel. They therefore framed a bill providing for ten vessels, and inserted in it the highest cost of building them. The committee do not wish to press the bill. It was said that there was no need of making the whole appropriation at once; that the timber could not be all procured within the present year, and that, consequently, the money would not all be wanted. To satisfy that objection, I moved you, sir, in behalf of the committee, that the appropriation should be divided, one-half for the present, and the other for the next year; and I am ready, if the Senate think it proper, to move for a further reduction of the appropriation. But why should you vote to build ten sloops of war, without furnishing the means to do it? I understand that some part of the timber necessary for building these vessels is already on hand. It is true that some kinds of timber can only be cut in the Winter, when the sap is down, but some of it may be obtained as well in the Summer. The committee have permitted the bill to lie upon the table for ten days, in order to obtain information from the Department. It is found that $425,000, for the present year, will not be too large an appropriation.

I do not wish said he, to trouble the Senate any further on the subject, but only to make a single remark. It is said that we may find difficulty in procuring seamen for our vessels. Because Great Britain, with her seven hundred ships, cannot obtain seamen without impressment, surely is no reason that we cannot find men for our twenty or thirty vessels. If this bill should pass the Senate, it will undergo a discussion in the other House, and will probably be postponed there, by other business. If anything is done this year, towards building the vessels, it is necessary it should be done soon. I, therefore, hope the bill will meet the acceptance of the Senate.

Mr. BARBOUR said he was willing to modify the bill, so as to meet the wishes of the gentleman from Maryland, if that object could be obtained, by dividing the appropriation between three or four successive years; whatever sum might be thought necessary for each year, had better be appropriated. So that the ten ships were built, he did not care whether it was in one, two, or three years.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, withdrew the motion which he had made, to fill the blank in the bill with four hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars annually, for two years.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, then moved to amend the bill, so as to provide for procuring the materials for building the vessels; and on motion of Mr. KING, of New York, the Senate adjourned till Monday next.

SENATE.

Additional Sloops of War.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

MONDAY, February 9.

JOHN TAYLOR, from the State of Virginia, whose credentials were filed during the last session, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. KING, of New York, presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, remonstrating against any increase of the existing tariff of duties, and, particularly, against the passage of the bill now before Congress on that subject, in its present shape. The memorial was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of William Davis, and others, of Plymouth, praying indemnification for depredations committed on their commerce by the public and private armed vessels of France, from the year 1793 to 1800; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented the memorial of William Thornton, Superintendent of the Patent Office, praying to be reinstated in the receipt of the salary allowed to him by the Secretary of State in the year 1810, which he alleges has since been reduced by mistake; and that the privilege of franking letters to and from his office, may be granted to him. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, of the clerks employed in their offices, and of the Librarian;" passed the 18th of April, 1818, was read the third time, and passed.

The resolution authorizing the payment of the funeral expenses of Samuel Turner, junior, deceased, was read the third time, and passed as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay to the widow of Samuel Turner, junior, deceased, late principal clerk in his office, the sum of one hundred dollars, out of the contingent fund, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of his funeral.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer; and it was further postponed to Wednesday next.

ADDITIONAL SLOOPS OF WAR.

The Senate resumed the unfinished business of Friday last, being the bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, authorizing the building of an additional number of sloops of war for the naval service of the United States. Mr. RUGLES in the Chair. The question was upon the amendment submitted by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, proposing merely to authorize the materials for building the vessels to be provided.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, supported his amendment upon the ground that the timber for the vessels could not be procured until the next Winter, as no contracts could be made early enough to get out the timber this Winter; and, that it was unnecessary to appropriate the money when the vessels could not possibly be built within the year. In considering the financial concerns of the country, in relation to the demands upon the Treasury, he thought the whole appropriation ought not now to be made.

Mr. LOWRIE could not see the necessity of building so many vessels immediately—he doubted the expediency of making so large an appropriation, confined to one or two years. It is said that the vessels are wanted for the suppression of piracy. Mr. L. said he thought that subject was at rest. Congress had authorized the purchase of vessels for that purpose, at the last session; and we have been told, from the proper Department, that the enterprise was successful, and that piracy was suppressed. If this is the case, that exigency does not now exist—of course, there is less necessity to complete these vessels immediately. On the ground that in peace we ought to prepare for war, Mr. L. was willing to vote for the whole number of vessels proposed by this bill. He conceived the only question now to be, at what time the money should be paid. He was in favor of amending the bill so as to appropriate $250,000 for the present year, and $150,000 annually for the four succeeding years. He thought a permanent appropriation better than an annual one, as such a course would place the subject before the Navy Board, to proceed according to their judgment and knowledge of the business. He was not opposed to the support of a Navy, to a certain extent. He considered that our present naval force, with the addition of the vessels proposed by this bill, would be quite large enough; and, if the act of Congress providing for the gradual increase of the Navy had contained a provision for ten sloops of war, he should have opposed any further increase; but he believed some small vessels were necessary, and was willing to vote for the bill provided the building of the vessels was not hurried.

Mr. BARBOUR made some remarks, in which he expressed his opinion in favor of a gradual increase of the Navy, and his opposition to the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Maine.

After some further remarks by Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, LLOYD, of Massachusetts, and SMITH, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMES, and lost—yeas 11, nays 21.

In pursuance of a suggestion which had been made by Mr. SMITH, Mr. BARBOUR moved to fill the blank for the appropriation with "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the present year, and two hundred thousand dollars annually for the three succeeding years." This was agreed to—yeas 24, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Benton, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards of Connecticut, Elliott, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Kelly, King of New York, Knight, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Branch, Brown, Chandler, Dickerson, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Lowrie, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, and Ware—13.

MISSISSIPPI LAND COMPANY.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer Oliver and others, directors of a corporation called the New England Mississippi Land Company, &c., reported as follows:

1st. That, by the articles of agreement and cession of the 24th of April, 1802, between the United States and the State of Georgia, it was agreed that the United States might (in such manner as not to interfere with the payment to be made to the State of Georgia, or with the satisfaction of certain land claims agreed to be confirmed by the United States) appropriate not exceeding five millions of acres for satisfying certain claims on the land then ceded to the United States, commonly called the Yazoo claims; provided the act of Congress making such appropriation was passed within one year.

2dly. That, by the act entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States, passed the 3d of March, 1803," so much as should be found necessary of the five millions of acres, reserved, as before stated, were appropriated to the purpose for which they had been reserved. But it was provided by that act, "that no other claims shall be embraced by this appropriation but those the evidence of which shall have, on or before the first day of January next, been exhibited by the claimants to the Secretary of State, and recorded in books to be kept in his office for that purpose," &c.

3dly. That, pursuant to the provisions of the last mentioned act, the claims to the said lands were exhibited to the Secretary of State, including those now in question, but the passage of the final act providing for their adjustment and satisfaction, was delayed until the year 1814.

4thly. That many of the claims, so exhibited, were found to conflict with each other, and also with rights which had been acquired by the United States in consequence of surrenders made to the State of Georgia, and which, by virtue of the cession, inured to the United States.

5thly. That, to make the indemnity and provide for the adjustment of the claims in question, the act of the 3d of March, 1814, was passed, by which—

1st. The President was authorized and required to cause to be issued from the Treasury of the United States, to such claimants, respectively, as had exhibited their claims agreeably to the act of 1803, certificates of stock, payable out of moneys arising from the sale of said public land, and, among other companies, to the persons claiming in the name or under the Georgia Mississippi Company, a sum not exceeding, in the whole, one million five hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

2d. That the claimants of the lands might file, in the office of the Secretary of State, a release of all their claims to the United States, and an assignment and transfer to the United States of their claim to any money deposited or paid to the State of Georgia, such release and assignment to take effect on the indemnification of the claimants, according to the provisions of that act.

3d. Commissioners were to be, and were, accordingly, appointed "to adjudge and finally determine upon all controversies arising from such claims so released as aforesaid, which may be found to conflict with and be adverse to each other, and also to adjudge and determine upon all such claims, under the aforesaid act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, as may be found to have accrued to the United States by the State of Georgia."

6thly. That the provisions of the act of 1814 were, in all respects, pursuant to a compromise made in behalf of the United States with the claimants, including the present petitioners, and that the release, required by the said act, was made by them.

7thly. That, before the commissioners, the petitioners, as trustees of the New England Mississippi Land Company, claimed, as the persons entitled to the one million five hundred and fifty thousand dollars directed to be issued to the Georgia Mississippi Land Company, their claim to indemnity for 957,600 acres, amounting to $130,425, was resisted in behalf of the Georgia Mississippi Company, on the ground that the consideration money for said lands had not been paid, and that therefore they were in equity entitled to the indemnity provided by the act of Congress. The commissioners decided in favor of the Georgia Mississippi Company, and the $130,425 were deducted from the amount awarded to the New England Mississippi Land Company, and distributed as follows: $50,608 48 to individual members of the Georgia Mississippi Company, who had released to the United States under the act of 1814, to whom the same has accordingly been paid; $79,816 52 was reserved to the United States, as being the shares of those claimants who, not having been paid the consideration money by the persons who had purchased of them, claimed to be still the legal and bona fide owners of said lands, and, as such, had availed themselves of the provision of the repealing act of the State of Georgia, and obtained the repayment of the consideration money by surrendering their titles to the State.

8thly. The petitioners object to this decision as erroneous, and they ask to have the $130,425 paid to them by the United States, or their release to the extent of the 957,600 acres cancelled, so that they may assert their title to the lands in a court of law. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Brown and Gilman, 4 Wheaton, 256, have decided that the grant from the Georgia Mississippi Land Company to the individuals who afterwards constituted and composed the New England Mississippi Land Company, conveyed the legal estate, notwithstanding the act of Georgia prohibiting the deeds for the same from being recorded; and that, by the terms of the contract and the law of the land, the grantors had no lien on the lands for the consideration money, and that therefore the decree of the commissioners, in that respect, was erroneous. For the grounds of that decision, its operation upon the interests of the petitioners, and those they represent, and for a more particular statement of the facts and circumstances connected with the whole transaction, the committee refer to the case of Brown and Gilman, to the decree of the commissioners accompanying this report, to the accompanying certificates of two of the commissioners, and to a more particular statement made by the petitioners to the Judiciary Committee, and adopted by them in their report last year on the same petition.

9thly. The Committee acquiesce in the correctness of the decision of the Supreme Court, and believe that the decision of the commissioners, on the point of law raised before them, was erroneous; but, as their decree was agreed and declared by the law to be final and conclusive on the rights of all the parties, and as they have not found any circumstances in the case requiring that the same should be opened, but many strong reasons against the propriety of doing so, a majority of the committee are of opinion that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read, and ordered to be printed.

ACCOUNTABILITY OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, Mr. RUGGLES in the chair, proceeded to consider the bill better to secure the accountability of public officers and others; which was introduced under leave obtained by Mr. HOLMES of Maine, and reported by the Committee on Finance.

[The first section of the bill provides, that no salary, compensation, or emolument, shall be paid to any person who is, or shall be, indebted to the United States, until such person has accounted for, and paid into the Treasury all sums for which he may be so indebted.

The second section makes it the duty of every accountable officer who, in making payment to the United States, is, by law, authorized to retain his fees, or salary, out of the money for which he is accountable, and who is indebted to the United States, to pay over, at the time required by law for his payments and accountability, all his fees and emoluments, until he shall have discharged the sums for which he is indebted; and makes it the duty of the Treasury Department, at a certain time in each year, to give notice to such officers, of the sums due from them; and makes it the duty of collectors, and other officers, to withhold the pay of the persons employed by them, until their debts to the Government are discharged.

The third section provides that no person shall be appointed to any office, which entitles him, in any way, to receive, and makes it his duty to account for, public moneys, who shall, at the time of such appointment, be indebted to the United States.

The fourth section makes it the duty of the President of the United States to communicate to Congress, in the first week of each session, the names of persons whose pay is withheld under the provisions of this act, with the amount due, &c., with a proviso, that in all cases where the pay of any person is withheld, it shall be the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury, if demanded by the person, to report, forthwith, to the agent of the Treasury Department, the balance; and it shall be the duty of such agent, within sixty days thereafter, to order suit to be commenced against such delinquent and his sureties.]

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, briefly recapitulated the provisions of the bill, with the remark, that its principles were such as, he conceived, ought to be adopted into the government of the country.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Accountability of Public Officers.

SENATE.

Mr. MILLS objected to the first section of the bill; he was willing to go as far as any man, to secure the accountability of those who are intrusted with the public money—but he knew very well, that, in a variety of instances, balances were reputed to be due, when, in truth, on a fair adjustment of accounts, nothing at all was found to be due. But perhaps this third section of the bill might extend, in its operation, further than the gentleman who proposed it had contemplated. It would apply to every officer who was a receiver of public money. In case of a foreign Minister, for instance, who had received his money for outfits, and was charged therewith. It would not be in the power of Government to exchange him to another Court, if it should become necessary, until he had accounted for moneys paid to him—previous to his nomination to the Senate, his account must be settled up or his appointment could not take place. A person might be distant from the Seat of Government, at the expiration of his term of service, and unable to adjust the balance against him, and yet he could not be re-appointed, however otherwise fit for the office, because of the balance, which it was not in his power to settle. Mr. M. said, he could not perceive the particular necessity of any part of the bill—but this section of it, he thought, ought not to be passed—he, therefore, moved to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. BRANCH believed the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in regard to the application of the third section of the bill, to foreign Ministers, would not hold good, because the outfit of the Minister became due him instantly on his appointment, and was not an item of charge to him, nor one for the expenditure of which he was bound to account to the Government.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, read the act already existing in regard to the disbursement of public moneys, and which prescribes rules, in order to ascertain who is indebted to the Government. He said, that an officer who received money, to be paid out on account of the Government, was not considered as being indebted to the Government, until the time at which he is bound to account for that money. The law allows him ample time to settle his account; the officer is entitled to hold his money until a certain period, and he is not considered as being indebted until that time arrives. The word "indebted" applied only to those who failed to account at the time prescribed, or where the person was found to be an absolute defaulter. It had been thought best, by some, to introduce a provision into the bill to dismiss from office such as were found deficient in the settlement of their accounts; but the right to do so was doubted. Certainly the right was vested in Congress to prevent the reappointment of defaulters. The whole bill goes upon the general principle, that men shall not be retained in the service of the Government who are defaulters. It is a rule of common life, never to trust persons in such situation in regard to private concerns; and it is much easier to avoid any evils arising from their employment in private than in public concerns. He believed there was no provision which would do more good than this. As to foreign Ministers, if they are intrusted with the public money, it is always in the power of the President to prescribe the time at which they are to account for it. There could never be any difficulty on account of public Ministers—the President would always give them sufficient latitude for the settlement of their accounts.

Mr. MILLS believed, after hearing the statements of the gentleman from Maine, and the law he had read, that there had already been enough of legislation on this subject. He considered that law a very salutary one; but the provision in the third section of this bill was going to impose restraint on the power of the Senate, to appoint officers, which ought not to be imposed. Cases might occur in which the President was satisfied that the person ought to be reappointed to his office, and yet he could not be appointed, in consequence of this section in the bill. The most honorable public officer might become a defaulter by loss of documents, or from other causes. The Department might tell him that his account could not be settled for want of his vouchers; his term of service might expire before he could apply to Congress for relief. The President could not nominate him, although perfectly satisfied that he was not indebted to the Government; and, by this means, although best qualified for it, the person might lose his chance for reappointment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, said it had often happened, it might again, that the vouchers of persons residing in a remote part of the Government may be lost or mislaid in transmission by mail. If the third section of this bill is agreed to, it will be imperative; and will prevent the appointment to public office of any person who is in arrears to the Government, from whatever cause. He had known an instance of a gentleman who was reported as a defaulter to the Government to the amount of $30,000, who did not, in fact, owe the Government one cent. He had known several other instances of a similar nature. Those men, of course, from no fault of their own, would be prevented from being candidates for office, if this bill were passed in its present shape. Instances are every day occurring of loss of documents. He thought the former law amply sufficient in this respect, and that the veto which the Senate has upon all appointments was security enough. It requires great experience to become acquainted with all the rules prescribed for the settlement of accounts in the different departments; there was great liability to difficulty in the business; they were frequently sent back for further explanation; great injustice might be done to individuals by the bill now proposed. They receive money to be disbursed for the public account, which is charged to them; and thus they become indebted to the Government, although they are not defaulters; or, they may not have been able to disburse the money, and render their accounts, within the time prescribed. He thought the law which before existed was sufficiently guarded in this respect.

Mr. SMITH said, that this discussion had suggested an idea to him which might be worth consideration. He did not know that the Senate could restrain the President in the appointment of any person to an office. Suppose the law should pass, and the President should appoint to office a person indebted to the Government. The Senate has a right to reject a person, when nominated, if he is indebted to the Government—but has Congress any right to impose rules for the Executive in this respect? Mr. S. said that he himself had once been stated to be a great public defaulter, although he never had any money concerns with the Government. He had a power of attorney to receive money for another person, which had been paid to him, and remitted to the person to whom it belonged; the money had been charged to him on the Treasury books, and he was reported as a defaulter, although he did not owe the Government a cent. If the President had seen fit to nominate him for any office, which probably had never entered his mind, he could not have done it, under this section of the bill, from his being stated as a public defaulter. Mr. S. did not see the necessity of this provision, as the Senate had already a right to reject any nomination which might be made.

Mr. LOWRIE thought the arguments which had been urged against the third section of this bill would apply equally well to the first and second sections. If it is imperative to withhold the appointment to office of those who are in arrears to the Government, it is also imperative to withhold their salaries while they are in the offices.

Mr. L. did not think the supposed cases of hardship could often occur. Many persons might have public moneys in their hands for certain purposes, and yet not be indebted to the Government. By fixing this qualification, the Senate would be relieved from great difficulties in investigating these subjects. He was, therefore, decidedly in favor of the bill as it now stood.

Mr. LANMAN appreciated as much as many could do the principle of this section of the bill, so far as it went to the protection of the Treasury. He was in favor of every provision which would go to preserve the purity of the modes in which money was to pass from the Treasury, and to prescribe accountability to public agents. He was willing to consent to the third section of this bill, if it went no further than the provision of which he had spoken: but he feared it involved something more than that—that it contained a disfranchisement of a great part of our fellow-citizens from office. A man might have been indebted to the Government, fifteen years ago, to the amount of a thousand dollars; and being unable to pay, from want of evidence to prove his having paid the money, for the purpose to which he ought to have applied it, he would be thus disfranchised from holding any office under the Government. He asked if this could be done under the Constitution? It would operate in a criminal and penal point of view. Upon these grounds, he would be compelled to vote against it, although he was willing to vote for any fair provision for the protection of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said he really had not expected a Constitutional objection to the disqualification of a public defaulter from being any longer a receiver of public moneys. He thought Congress had a right to prescribe qualifications for the officers appointed under the laws. Is there no right to prescribe that the Judges of the Supreme Court shall consist of persons learned in the law? or that no foreigner shall be employed in any department of the Government? Have we a right to prescribe these qualifications, and yet no right to prevent delinquents from holding offices of trust? If a collector becomes a delinquent, not from his own fault, his appointment can always be suspended until he has time to correct the evil. If the collector denied, the bill provides that it shall be the duty of the agents of the Government to institute a suit to try the case. In the present mode of appointment, the persons who hold the offices do not know what rules the Senate prescribes in acting upon Executive nominations; but, if the provisions of this law are adopted, the rule will be known and provided against by those who wish to be appointed. He apprehended that the Constitutional objection was not well founded.

Mr. PARROTT inquired if there was any precedent to authorize the prescribing rules to the Executive, in regard to appointments to office. He believed this section of the bill to be unconstitutional.

Mr. MILLS thought the question of the right to prescribe qualifications for offices, a very important one; and one which ought to be well considered before it was acted upon. The Constitution does not require that any officer, except the President and Vice President, shall be native born citizens of the United States. The Constitution provides certain qualifications for Senators and Representatives in Congress. Will it be contended that we have the right to add any qualifications to those already required by the Constitution for those officers? We have no more right to prescribe rules to the Executive, for nominations and appointments, than to the people, with regard to their Senators and Representatives. Have we a right to say that the Executive shall not nominate a person for any office, who is not forty years old, or who is not worth thirty thousand dollars, for the office of Collector? But, Mr. M. said, he objected to this provision on the ground of expediency alone; he thought we ought not to make too much regulation on this subject; that if this law had existed from its first establishment, it would have deprived the Government of the services of some of its best citizens. Among other instances, he mentioned the case of Captain O'Brien, our former Consul General to the Barbary Powers, who had been reported a defaulter, in consequence of the manner in which he was obliged to settle his accounts in Tunis—and of General Lincoln, the venerable Collector of the port of Boston, who had formerly been an agent to make a treaty with the Creek Indians, and stood charged on the public books with property distributed as presents to the Indians.

Mr. BRANCH said that Congress could have no right to prescribe qualifications for those offices which were fixed by the Constitution—but on the qualifications of the under officers of the Government, the Constitution was silent; we had no right to superadd to the Constitutional powers; but, where none are prescribed by that instrument, Congress has the right to make them. We have certainly the right to see that the duties of these offices are discharged faithfully and vigilantly, and to keep delinquents from them.

Mr. KING, of New York, said that in all the accounting offices, the laws prescribed qualifications for the persons who fill them. Where Congress has the right to create the offices, it has also the right to prescribe the requisite character of those persons by whom they are to be filled. For the collection of revenue, the imposition of taxes, &c., Congress has a right to make laws, and to provide for the appointment of the necessary officers, under those laws, and to prescribe the qualifications for them. If the officer is created by the law, he is subject to such regulation as the wisdom of Congress may impose. The older governments grow, the more lax they are apt to become, in their provisions for the accountability of their officers. Great sums of money must, necessarily, be paid out, through individual agents, and the object is, to protect the nation against the appropriation of the money to the private purposes of the agents. Corruption of public officers had been the greatest bane of governments. The fact whether a person really was a public defaulter, or not, Mr. K. conceived to be easily ascertainable, and, if he were so, he ought not to be appointed to any office. It had been the custom, upon nominations from the Executive, to reject such as were known to be public defaulters. Great benefit had resulted from this practice. In some cases, the provision in this bill might operate against persons who were not, in fact, indebted; but those instances would be rare, and others, equally qualified, might then be appointed to the offices—men, as good, as efficient, and as honest. On the whole, he thought no great public disadvantage could arise from the passage of the bill; and, on the contrary, that it would be of great benefit to the Government; that bad administration and bad morality were encouraged by laxity in this respect. If the case of a public officer were suspicious, it would always be better to get a man who was not so circumstanced.

Mr. HOLMES made some further remarks on the subject.

The motion of Mr. MILLS, to strike out the third section, was lost.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill so as to provide that a person should have been indebted one year, to prevent his appointment to office. After some discussion, this amendment was rejected.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

WEDNESDAY, February 11.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 19th ultimo, accompanied by two statements, showing the names of those Pursers and Navy Agents who are in arrears to the United States; and the report was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the petition of William L. Fisher, and others, of Germantown, Pennsylvania, praying that no additional duty be imposed on imported wool; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. KING, of New York, presented the petition of M. Hoffman, and others, auctioneers, of the city of New York, praying that no duty be imposed upon sales at auction; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. KING, of New York, the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, presented on the 9th instant, was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the gradual supply of cannon, bombs, and howitz, for the fortifications, reported the same with amendments; which were read.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Andrew Mitchell, deceased; and the bill to authorize the employing of certain assistants in the General Land Office, were, severally, read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer; and it was further postponed to Monday next.

The bill better to secure the accountability of public officers, and others, was read the third time, and the title amended, to read, "An act to secure the accountability of public officers, and others." The bill was then passed.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, and it was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of Roads and Canals;" "An act to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Samuel Brown;" and, "An act to define the boundary line between the Edwardsville and Springfield land districts, in the State of Illinois;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills last brought up for concurrence were severally read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Samuel Brown," was read the second time, by unanimous consent; and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill regulating the

DRAWBACK ON CORDAGE.

The bill proposed by Mr. D'WOLF, and reported by the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, allowing a drawback on the exportation of cordage, manufactured from foreign hemp, was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. D'WOLF rose in support of the bill. He said it was not by any argument of his own that he expected to convince the Senate of the propriety of this measure; but, if he could state facts, such as had convinced his own mind, and draw inferences from those facts, he hoped they might have some effect upon others. The bill under consideration was no new project; its good effects have been experienced almost as long as this Government has existed. The millions of dollars which have been exported, in rum and refined sugars, under this system of returning the duties on the raw material, when manufactured, and sent out of the country for consumption, has not only given employment to our ships and to our home industry, but has enriched our Treasury, by furnishing the means for imports, in this way—which imports the country could not have had without the adoption of this measure. You now return the duties, in all cases, provided the article remains the same at the time of exportation as when imported. Much more should you do so, when, by your own industry, value has been added to the imported article. The object of the bill now under consideration, Mr. D'W. said, was to create means for imports, to extend our trade with South America, and to encourage home industry. It proposes to allow the drawback on one article only, with the hope that the subject will be more fully understood, and the principle extended to other articles. A refusal to extend the drawback system to the manufacturers of the country, and to the mercantile interest, and to return the tax levied on the raw material imported, amounts to a prohibition of the exportation of the produce of the national industry in that shape; for the tax thus amounts to two freights on the manufactured article. The value added by manufacturing to the imported raw material constitutes a part of the industry of the country, as much as tobacco, cotton, grain, or any other produce for exportation, which is protected by the Constitution from taxation when taken out of the country. It is, then, no more than fair and equitable that these other products of industry should be exempted from taxation when carried out of the country for consumption. Common justice and sound policy require that all the productions of our industry should be placed upon the same footing. By the adoption of this measure, the Government does not abandon the interest it has in the property exported; it only suspends the collection of the tax. It is a forbearance to take out the toll or exaction for the present; it permits the share which the Government has in the property to be carried from the country, that it may be brought back again, increased in value, and better fitted for consumption; at which time, the Government will not fail to exact and receive its portion. The Government has an interest in every thing that goes out of the country, as furnishing the means to obtain that which is to come into it. Are not the policy and justice of a measure obvious, which gives all branches of our industry a fair and equal opportunity of finding markets abroad? Will it not have a tendency to increase the aggregate of our imports, and give more means for their consumption, by giving employment and encouragement to home industry and to commerce? Will not the extension of the drawback system add to our exports? And are not imports dependent upon exports? If the operation of this measure would lessen the domestic consumption of hemp, it would be some ground on which to build an argument as to the effect on the home growth, and on the revenue. But, on the contrary, it will increase the consumption of the imported article, because it will increase the employment of vessels—and can an increase of the consumption injure the home grower? If the bill would cause any diminution of the exports in raw materials of any kind produced in the country, Mr. D'W. said, he should expect it would be opposed; but he thought it could not be pretended that such a result would follow. On the contrary, the increased demand for tar, which this measure will cause to be worked up and exported, is worthy of consideration.

To confine those who manufacture articles for exportation to the use of the domestic raw material, when such raw material is not produced in sufficient quantity even for the consumption of your own country, is, in fact, a prohibition of the exportation of this branch of your industry; because, your merchants, under such circumstances, can find no markets abroad in which they can vie with the foreign competition in the sale of such articles, as foreigners can carry them to market free of the tax which our Government has levied on the raw material. The giving a preference to foreign hemp for exportation is no preference for the home use; and it is to the home use only that the domestic growers can look for a market: none of our productions go to the foreign, until the home market is supplied. How can you think of supplying foreign markets, when you cannot supply your own, with all the advantage that the duties, freight, and other expenses of importation give you? It is only the surplus productions that go abroad. There would, perhaps, be some danger that the drawback allowed will exceed the amount of duties collected on the hemp when the domestic production of it shall exceed the consumption, but not until then.

But, never can the measure, at any time, or in any event, prove injurious to the home growers of the raw material. Suppose Louisiana produced as much sugar and molasses as the United States consumes at this moment—would the drawback allowed on refined sugar, and rum distilled from imported materials, be an injury to the Louisiana cultivation of the sugar cane? Mr. D'W. asked, how? It certainly would not lessen the home consumption, to which he looks exclusively for a market, nor prevent his exporting, if a surplus were produced. And much less could such injury be suffered as the fact now stands; when there is not, perhaps, one-fourth part the sugar and molasses made that is consumed in the United States—probably not one fiftieth part of the hemp.

This measure, if it is adopted, will give new employment to our shipping, and our domestic manufactures, to the whole extent of the business done in the way contemplated; for it cannot be done at all without it; and, if you extend the policy, this employment will be extended without taxing any other branch of industry whatever. If it were true, that granting the drawback would cause one pound less of domestic hemp to be worked up, or used in any way, or would take one cent of revenue from the imported article, there would be some apology for opposition to it. It will be advantageous to the farmer, as all branches of industry give means for purchasing the surplus provisions, and raw materials, which are seeking a market. If, then, this measure will benefit two great branches of industry, without incurring the odium of being chargeable upon any other, it is certainly worth the experiment. Mr. D'W. said, he thought the true policy of the country would be to carry much further the system of returning duties on imported raw materials, when manufactured, and taken out of the country for consumption. When the country produced them, in sufficient quantities for its own consumption, his solicitations would be abated; although, even then, there might be good reasons for continuing the policy, until the country should give enough of the raw material to supply its manufacturing labor, both for home use, and for exportation. But, when the home production of the raw material comes up to the consumption of the manufactured article for home use, there may be some reason to refuse the drawback, and confine the manufacturer to the use of the raw material produced by his own country; but infinitely more reasonable and honorable would it be for the agriculturist to wait until he could give the raw material as cheap as other countries, before he confines the manufacturer to the use of his own productions; thus leaving both those branches of industry to compete in foreign markets, with the industry of the world, on even ground. For the agriculturist to use the power which he so justly holds, and which he ever ought to hold, to confine the manufacturer and mechanic to the use of the domestic raw material, which he will not, cannot, or does not supply, thus drying up the streams of industry, which should always be kept open and free, is unreasonable, unjust, and cruel. The proper object, with the legislator, is, to make the most of the skill and industry of this country, in the aggregate, to economise the employment of his national family; opening the markets, both domestic and foreign, for his own productions, in all shapes, upon fair and equal principles. The merchant and the manufacturer are only asking the same privilege of exporting the products of their industry, as the farmer does, free of taxation. It may as well be said that the laws regulating the moral conduct of the citizens are destructive of their liberty, as that the regulation of trade abridges the freedom of it. All branches of trade and industry are, and always ought to be, left free to seek their own level, under the laws. Mr. D'W. said, he was fully in favor of taxing foreign productions imported into our country, for the encouragement of all branches of our own industry, as is the practice of other nations, where the policy of such a measure was obvious. Indeed, he considered that we were drawn into that course by other nations having adopted it. If nobody had put up any fences, we could all cultivate the earth, and enjoy the blessings of Providence in common; but when our neighbors have all made their enclosures, and we leave our portion common to all, we must expect that others will have great advantages over us.

As to the narrow policy of retaining in the country the redundant imports, lest the Treasury accounts should not show so large an amount, at the moment, it is altogether fallacious; for the revenue received on your imports, not consumed, is only an anticipation of your income, as was shown in the article of hemp, the year before last, when we imported 8,835 tons, which was, at least, 3,000 tons more than was consumed. The consequence was, that only 2,693 tons were imported the last year. These facts show that importation, beyond consumption, is no advantage to your revenue; and, when such an excess of importation occurs, you may as well allow it go out of the country, and allow the drawback upon it, as to retain it in the way of your next year's importation. That which is imported, and the duties upon it secured, is domesticated and naturalized; and makes a part of your common stock, with that of domestic growth. When this common stock is greater than is wanted for the use of the country, will it not be better for the home-grown hemp that you allow some of it to be taken out of the country, after working it up, and return the price, by the payment of which it became naturalized, than to keep it on hand in the way of another season's supply? The surplus cannot be taken out of the country in the same state in which it was imported.

Mr. D'WOLF remarked, that he had no personal interest in the passage of this bill; but was induced to advocate it from his knowledge of the beneficial effects it would produce to those who were interested in this manufacture. He had been told by Mr. Lewis, of Boston, who has extensive works for the manufacture of cordage, that application was made to him, by a merchant from South America, for a hundred tons of cordage. Mr. Lewis named the lowest price at which it could be furnished, but the gentleman replied that the cordage could be procured in England on more favorable terms. On investigation, it was ascertained that he could purchase it twenty-five dollars per ton cheaper, in England, and that this difference in price was altogether owing to the fact that the English, who obtain their hemp from the same country whence we procure ours, allow the drawback on exportation of the cordage.

Mr. D'WOLF begged gentlemen, who advocate the interest of the makers of iron, to compare their application to Congress for an increase of duties on the imported article, with that of the workers of hemp, who only ask, upon the same principle that is contained in this bill, that the produce of their labor should be allowed to go to market unshackled with the tax you have levied on the raw material. We have arrived at manhood in these branches of manufacture. Our skill, our machinery, and our industry, are equal to any in the world; the capital is invested; the works are complete; the workmen have acquired the art; they more than supply the country with the produce of their labor, and are desirous to carry it to foreign markets. The system is shown to be practicable by the operation of that part of it which has already been adopted. All experience proves that it is practicable. We have practised it for thirty years, and benefited the country to the amount of millions, by the practice.

If the American merchant goes to Russia, and purchases his cordage, manufactured with Russian tar, and with Russian labor, you allow him, for his own convenience, to bring it into your ports, and bond it; and when he exports it, you permit him to draw back the duty; thus giving encouragement to the foreign industry which produces the tar and manufactures the cordage, in preference to the industry of your own country. The bill now under consideration proposes to give this encouragement to our own citizens, instead of foreigners.

Mr. FINDLAY said, he had made up his mind, at the last session, in regard to this bill, and he had heard no reason since, which induced him to alter his opinion; but, as the new tariff bill, if adopted, would have some effect upon this bill, he hoped it would be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. SMITH said he was sensible that there was very little chance of passing this bill. He presumed that most of the members had made up their minds upon the subject at the last session; but, as there are some new members, who were not present at that time, he wished to express his views upon it. The principle contemplated in this bill, he said, was not a new one. It had been in operation almost ever since the first establishment of the Government. A drawback of the duties on the exportation of imported articles has long been allowed. On the exportation of rum manufactured from foreign molasses a drawback of the duties on the raw material is permitted. This gives employment to the industry of the United States. If you did not do this, you would prevent the importation of the molasses, and the exportation of the rum. In the article of loaf sugar, too, the exporter is allowed to draw back the duty on the raw material. During the late war, a tax was imposed upon whiskey. The agricultural interest insisted that the tax should be drawn back upon exportation. We should have shut ourselves out of all foreign markets for the article, if the drawback had not been allowed. Mr. S. thought the Government had no right to give bounties for the exportation of any article; nor did the present bill propose any such thing, but only to allow a drawback, on the exportation of the manufactured article, of the duty on the raw material. Hemp is an exceedingly bulky article—we have to go a great way for it—it pays a heavy duty. If that duty is not refunded, on exportation, you completely prevent your merchants and manufacturers from a competition, in foreign markets, with the merchants and manufacturers of other countries. It is no more than a fair principle to grant it. It will give employment to a large portion of our shipping. It will assist in making up our assorted cargoes for the South American markets. We stand in a peculiar relation to the South American States. We were the first to acknowledge their independence, and to recognise them as nations. And shall we now shut ourselves out from the enjoyment of their trade? In England, the drawback is allowed on every imported article, when exported, in whatever shape it may appear; and this is one of the great principles of trade which has raised that nation to its present commercial greatness. We are now about to pursue a course to encourage all the manufactures of the country. Mr. S. said he was perfectly willing to do this, so far as it could be done without breaking down other branches of business. He was surprised that gentlemen who were so willing to tax all imported articles, to favor manufactures, were not willing to grant this drawback upon the same principle. The trade to South America is a very important one. We may, to a considerable extent, supply their markets with every article they want, upon which we are not compelled to pay a duty to our own Government. That trade is annually increasing. We export to that country great quantities of soap and candles; the manufacture of which gives extensive employment to our people. It is now proposed to lay a high duty on foreign tallow. The duty has, hitherto, been so small, that the manufacturers of those articles could enter into a fair competition with those of other countries, in foreign markets.

It is provided in the Tariff bill, which proposes to increase the duties on foreign tallow, that the duties shall be drawn back on the exportation of the candles manufactured from it. We now export a great many articles to South America, such as furniture, saddles, hats, boots, shoes, iron castings, &c. Of these the raw materials are the products of our own country, and there is, of course, a fair competition. We hold it as a principle, that where men do their work, exclusive of the use of the foreign article, they should be allowed to export the products of their labor, and have the advantage of fair competition. In the articles we export to South America, most of them are free from duty. We export a large quantity of hats; and we allow furs to be imported into this country free from duty. Our hat makers are, consequently, enabled to work as cheap as those of any other country. Castings of iron are, also, considerable articles of export to South America, and the demand for them is daily increasing; for these the raw material is produced in our own country. So in regard to our cotton goods; large quantities of certain kinds are exported to Mexico, Lagaira, and other places; no duty is paid on the raw material. They value our cotton goods more than those of any other country, and Mr. S. hoped they would continue to take them. But, if we had a duty to pay on them, we certainly could not export them. They do not require a drawback, because they pay no duty. If he thought this measure would go to reduce the revenue, Mr. S. said, he should not support it; he believed it would not have that effect, but that it would rather tend to increase the revenue. There would certainly be a saving of two and a half per cent. of the duty on the raw material; as the Government always reserves that amount out of the duties drawn back. He believed the bill was bottomed upon a sound principle; he was not able to perceive any thing objectionable in it, unless it was that, in drawing back the duties, there might be a loss to the Government, from the unusual quantity of tar made use of in manufacturing the cordage; and he conceived that there could not be much danger in that respect. If the bill should pass, it would enable the manufacturers of this country to supply South America with cordage; and a great many vessels would be employed in the business to which it would give rise.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, inquired if the honorable member from Rhode Island could inform him what were the prices of the foreign and domestic hemp, in our own markets, at the present time.

Mr. D'WOLF was not able to give the price of domestic hemp; he did not know of any recent sales of that article. Russian hemp was quoted at about $180 per ton. Sales had lately been made, in New York, at about $175.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, had not intended to say any thing upon this subject, but he now felt it his duty briefly to express his views on it. He understood that American hemp was not in as good demand, in our own markets, as formerly, and he thought the allowance of drawback on cordage, manufactured from foreign hemp, might have a tendency to reduce it still lower. The domestic growth of the article would be extinguished, because it could not then meet the competition of the foreign article, which is much more esteemed abroad. He thought the opportunity of the South American markets would be very advantageous to the home growers of hemp. The cordage made of foreign hemp might now be exported; but that which was not made of foreign hemp ought to be permitted to be exported, with the privilege of being exempt from duty. The allowance of this drawback would cause an increased importation of the article—the demand would not equal the supply—and there would be a consequent and general fall of the article. There would be such a quantity in the market, that no man could turn his attention to the growth of it. The raw material would then be sold at a loss, rather than encounter the risk of a foreign market. Can it be policy to discourage the home growth of the raw material, when we have a great portion of soil that is peculiarly adapted to it? Why discourage those who are willing to turn their attention to it? He considered this bill as offering a bounty to the growth of foreign hemp. On one hand we are told that the interests of the country require that we should discourage the importation of all raw materials; and now, on the other, we are besought, for the same reasons, to encourage their importation, and God knows what we shall come to between such discordant propositions. A drawback is allowed on iron cables; and they are, very frequently, used on board the vessels that carry them out, and obtain the drawback upon them. If persons choose to rig their vessels with ropes, upon which they have received the drawback, how are you to prevent it? If iron cables are used in this way, why may not cordage be? Mr. L. thought it would furnish great opportunities for fraud.

Mr. DICKERSON said it appeared to him that the Senate had, at the last session, all the information it could obtain upon the subject. But he now rose to move a postponement of the bill, because he thought it ought to follow the tariff bill, as it was necessary to ascertain what duty would be laid upon hemp, before it was determined what drawback was to be allowed upon the cordage. If the tariff was to be altered, the amount of drawback could not now be fixed. He thought the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island would not risk the fate of the bill, in point of time, by waiting till then. Mr. D. expressed himself in favor of the general system of allowing drawback; but he was not disposed to extend it to manufactured articles, the raw material of which was produced in our own country. If molasses had been produced in the country at the time the law passed allowing a drawback on rum manufactured from foreign molasses, he presumed that drawback would not have been allowed. There was much less inconvenience in allowing drawback on articles exported in their original state—packages in bulk could be easier identified, and were not liable to alteration; and on articles which we do not produce ourselves, the remission of the duties was, unquestionably, beneficial. But as the discussion of this subject would come in more properly, after the fate of the tariff bill had been decided, he moved to lay the bill on the table. The motion was, however, withdrawn, to give way for further discussion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, said he did not perceive any good grounds why manufactures of foreign articles should be exempted from the duty on the raw material. He thought it was giving preference to the manufacture of the foreign article, and that it was wrong, as a principle of justice, that the manufacturer should be exempted from paying his quota towards the expenses of the Government. Upon the first view of the case, it certainly appears to be unjust that the burden should be thrown exclusively upon the agricultural interest. It may be that this trade, in England, pays no duty on the raw material, and yet we may impose such a duty, and still our manufacturer be on a better footing than the English. The manufacturing labor of England may not be taxed in this way, and yet there are so many other ways in which they are compelled to pay taxes, that, though we are subject to duty, we may be able to undersell them in this article. The equity and the liberality of our laws may afford us this advantage. Gentlemen may see the danger of great principles in the consideration of small items which involve those principles. We have a vast deal of capital employed in manufacturing, which pays little or nothing towards the support of the Government. In England it pays a great deal; that branch of industry is relied upon for the support of Government. Our free and equal laws give prosperity to that species of labor. But if we exempt that great mass of labor from paying their proportion towards the support of the Government, and put the burden upon others, Mr. T. said, the result might be such as he had rather contemplate than express.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said he had not intended to trespass again on the Senate upon this subject. He set too little value on his own opinions to be willing to repeat them even at twelve months' distance. He had taken occasion, at the last session of Congress, to express his sentiments on the benefits resulting from the system of drawbacks, which, in a commercial point of view, he considered as one of the most beneficial arrangements which had ever been adopted by the Government. Without it, importation must be narrowed and limited precisely by the consumption of the country. Importations might fluctuate in different years; sometimes more and sometimes less than was required; but, without this allowance of drawback, no exportation, of cordage especially, could take place; and, without exportation, the importation must be limited by the consumption of the country; for no man would buy what he could not sell, if his object was profit. The drawback system also leaves a benefit to the revenue; as a part, though not a large one, is always restrained from the duties.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LLOYD) has asked, if we are willing to give a bounty on foreign, instead of domestic hemp; to encourage foreign agriculture instead of our own? Mr. L. said, he was willing to consider it as a bounty; but it was a bounty to our agriculturists, to our commerce, and to our manufactures. We must pay for the hemp we buy, with our produce—by its exportation, in the first instance, to furnish funds to purchase hemp—to our ships to carry it. And the drawback would give encouragement to our domestic manufactures, by enabling them to go into markets which they cannot now enter; as cordage, without the drawback, is dearer in this country than in any other in which it is manufactured.

When it suited the purpose, Mr. L. said, we were very fond of quoting the example of Great Britain. What had it been, generally, with objects of this description? Great Britain admits the raw material free of cost, in many instances, and allows a bounty on its exportation, when manufactured at home. What do we, in respect to the article of cordage? We tax the raw material heavily, and deny any bounty on it, when manufactured and exported; but we allow a drawback on imported cordage, which has been made in Russia—thus giving a bounty to the Russian manufacturer, and denying it to our own.

The operation of this measure could not, as he believed, be unfavorable to the growth of domestic hemp. We have imported hemp, under heavy duties, for thirty or forty years; during which time, attempts have been repeatedly made to supersede the use of it, by the introduction of domestic hemp. He was sorry to say, that the experiment appeared to have failed. From some unfortunate circumstance, we could not cure the hemp sufficiently well, to bring it into general use; and, until this were done, we must continue to import hemp, if we are to continue to have navigation. He doubted if, at this moment, ten tons of domestic hemp could be found in any city on the seaboard of the United States, from New Orleans to Portland. He hoped that a drawback would be allowed, not only on cordage, but on many other articles manufactured from foreign materials; as the system presented an evident means, as he thought, of furnishing increased employment for our people, as well as encouragement to our agriculture and our commerce. If it was thought better to regulate the details of the bill, after a decision was had on the revision of the tariff, he did not know that there would be any objection to that course—he did not propose it, however; and hoped, at any rate, that the principle of the bill would be adopted.

On motion of Mr. LANMAN, the further consideration of the subject was postponed till Monday next, and made the order of that day.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the further consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, he rose with some confidence, created by the intrinsic merit of the subject, and not from any conviction of talent in himself for public speaking. Is it expedient, said he, to abolish imprisonment for debt? This is the question. I am in favor of a total abolition, without any conditions, either previous or subsequent. I wish it distinctly understood that I am willing that the remedy against the property of the debtor should be extended as far as any reasonable man can require. But to allow the body of a citizen, under any circumstances, to be imprisoned at the discretion of his equal, in any civil action, of whatever description, I consider a most flagrant violation of personal liberty. If, in the private transactions of individuals, any of the parties shall demean themselves in such manner as to incur the charge of criminality, let such conduct be considered penal. Give to the injured citizen his remedy in the property of the aggressor. Let the Government arraign the criminal, and in the establishment of his guilt, let punishment, proportioned to the crime, be inflicted. In case of assault and battery and breach of the peace, the injured party has his remedy for the damage which he has sustained. His lien should be solely against the property of the offender. But, for disturbing the harmony of society, the offender is properly subject to a criminal prosecution, and fine and imprisonment are his just desert. Here the line of separation between the jurisdiction of the criminal and civil code is maintained, as it should exist in all other cases. In case of a fraudulent suppression of truth, or the suggestion of a falsehood in private transactions, give the injured party reparation for the civil injury, and define fraud as you have felony—make it a part of the criminal code, and when, upon the solemnities of a Constitutional trial, guilt is detected, punish it as it deserves; humanity will not revolt at the proceeding—rectitude will rejoice. The line of jurisdiction between the civil and criminal code should be fairly drawn in every case.

In a country free as ours, civil injury and crime should never be confounded. Punishment is a retribution for offence, and is solely the prerogative of the sovereign power of the State. Civil injury is repaired by pecuniary satisfaction, and thus the injured person has a right to claim.

But the moment you clothe one citizen with the power of depriving another of his personal liberty, whether for debt or for any other cause, where the State is no party in the suit, you establish a petty tyranny in the land, more extensive, more odious, more despotic and destructive, than the feudal system.

Let it also be recollected, that, to punish an individual for an alleged offence, which has not been defined, by law, previous to its commission, is a violation of the most sacred rights of freedom.

And where it is impracticable to define violations of the moral laws, so as to make them a part of the penal code, lest too much discretionary power should be confided to our courts to attempt the infliction of punishment, must be dangerous in the extreme. It is upon this principle that many violations of the moral law escape legal chastisement. The father who neglects to advance his son in virtuous and intellectual improvement, when both are within his power, who destines his ill-fated offspring to servile employment, until the age of political and legal independence emancipate him is not liable to the law, although the sentiment of all around him, condemns and abhors his sordid career. The son, who in the declining years of his father, has become possessed of his whole property, upon the understanding that the father shall be cherished and supported with filial tenderness and assiduity, and who yet abandons his hoary locks and woeworn features to poverty and wretchedness, is not obnoxious to the law, though he merits and possesses the reprobation of mankind; is disgraced in the estimation of the honorable and virtuous, and is a foul transgressor in the presence of his Creator. Why do these gross violations of every thing sacred in paternal affection and filial duty, pass without legal avengement? It is because the power of punishing would be liable to abuse; because it might, in some cases, endanger the liberty of the citizen. We therefore content ourselves with leaving these violations of nature and justice to the reprehensions of public sentiment. Christianity enjoins upon us the duty of benevolence and charity towards all mankind; yet, whoever seriously regarded such an injunction as a proper subject for public legislation? It is upon principles such as I have mentioned, that I would abolish imprisonment for debt in every possible form.

Communicate and confirm this power, and you place an innocent and unfortunate debtor on the same ground with the most abandoned swindler; the line of demarcation between right and wrong, innocence and guilt, completely vanishes. In vindication of the cruel system which it is my wish to expose, we are told that its evils are exaggerated, and that the moral sense of the community will shield the unfortunate from oppression. But who sees not that this very apology, while it honors the public feeling, pours disgrace upon the law? To ascertain the real character of this system, we must trace the consequences that would follow its rigid execution. I ask, then, what number of individuals in the United States can be made subjects of imprisonment for debt? I answer, all who could not punctually discharge the demands against them, including the wives and children, and others dependent on this class of the community. I presume it would not embrace fewer than a million of souls. Shall such a body of freemen be degraded by caprice, or ruined by malignity? If such be the case, at a period in our history, when only forty-seven summers have beamed upon our independence, and our population amounting to ten millions, what must be our condition when our population shall amount to fifty millions? When New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Charleston, New Orleans, and others of our cities, shall be animated with the busy pursuits of a million in each, what will be our condition under this barbarous system? Imagination shudders while she anticipates the result; and virtue, benevolence, and justice, weep and frown. But, it has been said that the evils have been exaggerated; few instances of rigorous oppression occur in our courts of judicature. Admit, for a moment, that this is the fact; does this forbid our investigation of existing evil principles? Allow me to suppose that a solitary individual has fallen, or is liable to fall, a victim to the unjust laws of his country. Is his affliction to be disregarded? Such is not the constitution of Heaven, whose model we can never too much imitate and accurately adopt. No consideration is too minute for the condescension and superintendence and concern of our Heavenly Father. By him the hairs of our head are all numbered. Even the flight of sparrows, though two of them be but of the value of a farthing, elude not his providential observance. I ask, in language derived from superhuman authority, is not man of more value than many sparrows? It is a notorious fact that we undervalue the solemn duties of legislation. By the suffrages of the people, a power is invested in us superior to every thing which has immortalized the stern Lycurgus and the yielding Solon; to exert that power is a duty which the people reasonably expect, and which every generous and enlightened sentiment of the heart inculcates. I have before me record evidence of the evils of imprisoning debtors, which would chill the blood of any feeling man. It might turn a Nero pale and make a Caligula shudder. Why do any of us question the enormity of the practice which we are compelled to condemn? Because we are removed from the scenes of misery. Had we a Howard, that illustrious measurer and reliever of human calamity, among us, though he should possess the disposition, time would fail him to visit our abodes of authorized misery. An authentic account of the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition, for three hundred and fifty years, has recently been published; during that period thirty-one thousand three hundred and sixty-five persons have been burned alive without offence; eighteen thousand eight hundred and forty-nine have been degraded and burnt in effigy; two hundred and eighty thousand two hundred and fourteen have been condemned to perpetual imprisonment, or to the infamous galleys of this holy association, constituting the number of three hundred and forty thousand nine hundred and twenty-one. These savage cruelties were confined to Old Spain. They embrace not her vast possessions in South America and other parts of our globe. What eloquence can portray the silent agony, the bursting groans of the victims of this heart-rending cruelty! The Spanish nation generally were probably ignorant of these barbarous measures, and no doubt would have denied their existence; like those who deny the evils of imprisonment for debt, the Spaniards knew nothing or little of this extent of suffering. Occasionally a near and affectionate relative may have had some obscure idea of this horrid persecution. The watchful anxiety of some kindred spirit may have heard the unavailing sigh, the expiring pang of the agonized victim; but these were lost in the tumult of the world, or if remembered, remembered only to be forgotten. In a manner analogous to this the debtor suffers the evils of imprisonment in these United States. We accustom ourselves to that species of apathy, which, having ears, hears not. The tear of desolation drops unobserved, and the visions of calamity pass away like a dream. The decision of a court of justice deposits the body of a patriot in the gloom of a jail, merely for the sin of having been unfortunate, and of all his animating hopes leaves not a wreck behind. Few are acquainted with his misfortunes; still fewer shed the generous tear of sympathy. Taught to venerate the decisions of the judiciary, and the officers of justice, the hearts of his fellow-citizens, not more worthy than himself, welcome the hardness of the nether mill-stone and the adamant. In this way the march of tyranny is usually silent, but always desolating.

Let Congress violate the rights of an individual, however obscure, what would be the consequence? The thunder of loud and generous indignation would roar from the rocks of Maine to the Gulf of Mexico; from the blue wave of the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. No man could be strong enough in the affections of the people to sustain himself against a solitary instance of individual oppression. But, let the vindictive creditor consign to the cell his unfortunate debtor. Let him demand manacles and fetters; let him permit life to linger on hardened bread and noxious water, and all is well; the law justifies the procedure; he may triumph in the power which he exercises, and glory in the idea that the public law stands a silent, perhaps a smiling spectator of the scene. I console myself with believing that this nation can feel for human misery, estimate correctly the value of freedom, and will ultimately select proper instruments for its destruction. In the town of Boston, consisting of a population of fifty thousand souls, from a report furnished me by a respectable society in that city, I have the affliction to learn that, during the year 1820, fourteen hundred and forty-two persons were imprisoned for debt; in the year 1821, twelve hundred and eighty-one; and in the three quarters of the year 1822, seven hundred and sixty-nine persons, citizens of our Union—four hundred and thirty of these incarcerated victims were females! The whole number imprisoned during this period amounted to three thousand four hundred and ninety-two; among these, two thousand and eighty-four persons were hurried into prison for debts under twenty dollars. The aggregate costs of these small debts exceeded the amount of the debts themselves.

I have read with much interest some of the reports of the commissioners who were appointed, at the last session of the Legislature of Massachusetts, to visit the various prisons in the State, for the humane purpose of ascertaining their condition, of learning whether the state of the sufferers could be rendered more correspondent with the wish of humanity. I have not seen a consolidated report of this subject; but, from reading detached parts in the Boston papers, I have observed that debtors were confined in almost every prison. Males and females, in one instance, imprisoned in the same room. In one of the jails the felon and debtor were confined in the same room; and, in another, the debtors enjoyed one comfortable meal in the twenty-four hours.

I am giving facts relative to one of the States of this Union; a State distinguished for patriotism; a State where the arts and sciences are flourishing; a State remarkable for moral improvements and for piety; a State, in fine, that has been justly denominated the Cradle of the Revolution.

But for the benevolence of a society in Boston, and the humane act of the Legislature, these disclosures would never have been made, or, if made, would have been pronounced incredible. I mention not these facts with a view of casting the least reproach upon the good people of Massachusetts. No, sir, the operation of this system is every where the same, in the United States and in Europe. During the last session of Congress, record evidence of the same system was offered in the city of New York, and the result was the same. The prison was always crowded with debtors, and, although peculiar circumstances may sometimes produce a temporary relaxation of the severity of the system, yet, so long as confinement for a pecuniary demand is legalized, so long will your strongholds of inhumanity be crowded with the children of misfortune and anguish; the Gorgon of misery will continue to grow with the march of time, and with the swell of population. Trust no man, sir, with arbitrary power. If you do, were he an angel, he would sink himself into a fiend. The respectable and generous society in Boston, to which I have alluded, declares that the incarceration of these three thousand four hundred and ninety persons involved about ten thousand in the deepest sorrow. Here is nothing like exaggeration. The calculation will be sustained in the mind of every man who permits his reflections to trace the ramifications of society, including wife, children, and friends. Assuming this view as the clue for our calculation, every liberal principle of the heart becomes paralyzed while it unavoidably beholds the multitudes of free citizens of our Union who have bedewed their pillows with the tears of affliction. How many have been injured and degraded by this barbarous custom since the termination of the late war with Great Britain!

The debtor, sunk beneath the elevation of man, may in vain utter his importunate request—have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. Had he been permitted to have pursued his avocations, by industry, frugality, and the blessings of Heaven, he would have emerged from his wretchedness; he might ultimately have discharged every righteous demand, and have terminated the career of life with credit and honor. But, no, sir, while the humane creditor would willingly indulge, avarice marches forward as unfeeling as malignity, grasps after all, and delivers him to the officers of the law, who confine him to prison, and complete his ruin. Still, sir, we believe the evils exaggerated. I have been taught to believe that morality was the basis of legislation, and that fearful denunciations are uttered against sins of omission as well as sins of commission. It is a solemn duty to reflect upon our accountability to God, as well as to our constituents. I recollect that Azariah, a king of Judah, is said to have done that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his fathers had done. But the high places were not removed; the people sacrificed and burnt incense upon the high places. The angry majesty of Heaven smote the King, so that he was a leper unto the day of his death. We have reason to rejoice in the blessings purchased with the blood of our fathers. Let us be grateful for their transmission; let us preserve them inviolate. Liberty of conscience, liberty of speech, liberty of the press, trial by jury, the right of personal liberty, and personal security—these are inestimable immunities.

But let not their brightness dazzle us. Let us walk in these charming paths. But let us ask ourselves if there is nothing left for us to do? Are there no high places undemolished? No sacrifice, no incense to Moloch unsuppressed?

We should not forget the animating, the expiring accents of a prophet. He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God: And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth; even as a morning without clouds. We are indebted to our Anglo Saxon ancestors, more than to any other nation or people on earth, for the assertion of liberty, and for the vital principles of representative Government. Talk not of the sanction of antiquity, of the veneration due to former times, when you deliver to the custody of the law a poor unfortunate debtor. Antiquity is against the measure, as far as respects our ancestors. Look into English history, you will discover that the practice, which charity condemns, was introduced by judicial countenance and usurpation. At the period of the overthrow of the Saxon Heptarchy by Egbert, first King of England, such profound respect was entertained for the personal liberty of the citizen, that no man could suffer imprisonment in civil actions, and in no case, except for offences against the penal code. In all cases of arrests the peace of the kingdom must have been disturbed by violence and outrage. Such was the undisgraced, the happy condition of society, in this respect, for many centuries.

This liberty was confirmed by the wise administration and public institutions of the illustrious Alfred. In process of time, however, while the kingdom was harassed by Danish invasions, and the eruptions of other Northern Powers, creditors, and the mercenary officers of the courts of judicature of that day, contrived to induce the judges to issue such civil process as to subject the debtor in civil actions, to imprisonment. This was the first step towards the introduction of a system which has extended its baleful influence to every civil transaction, whether accompanied with force or fraud, or exempt from the imputation of either. Then were those legal chains begun to be forged which have compressed the withered limbs of the unhappy debtor. Until the Norman conquest, this jealousy for personal liberty beat strong in every bosom. William the Conqueror introduced the tyranny of the feudal system, and labored to toll a curfew that should put out all the fires of personal independence. He depressed the conquered Saxons, and elevated his Norman followers by giving them large landed estates and extensive political power.

It was not, however, until the long reign of Henry III. that Parliament formally established the system of imprisonment in civil cases. And what was the object of this first statute? what the extent of the principle? It was first established in favor of the Barons alone, against the bailiffs or receivers of their rents. Who were these Barons? They constituted the entire nobility, the landed aristocracy of the kingdom. They constituted one powerful branch of the National Legislature. They were the House of Lords. The law was at first limited and guarded. A bailiff could not be taken into the custody of law unless he had not only received money, but had absconded, and had refused to account for or liquidate the amount in his possession, by a regular settlement. If this were done, whether able to pay fully or not, his body was held sacred and his liberty secure. If the bailiffs or collectors had real estate, however small, upon which the process of attachment could operate, his body could not be arrested for a moment; a violation of his personal independence would have subjected a Baron to heavy damages. Ultimately, however, the Court and Barons, and the officers of the law prevailed, and the body was made liable to unconditional imprisonment and chains. Here, sir, is another proof, if evidence were at all wanting, of the superior power of wealth and political privilege over poverty and misfortune. The court and the creditors found their account in the harshest measures. They found that, by extreme rigor, though one party was ruined, theirs was the profit. By slow degrees, this system continued to advance. In the succeeding reign of Edward I. this principle was extended to merchants against their debtors, for the purpose of elevating them in society, and, by such elevation, counteracting, in some degree, the influence of the Barons, which had become dangerous and alarming; so much so, that it held monarchy itself in check, and even threatened the destruction of regal power. In the reign of Edward III. this horrid system was enlarged so as to embrace actions in general of debt and detainue. One hundred and fifty years after, under the reign of Henry VII., the circle was completed. Violence and disaster, breach of trust and sheer misfortune, were crimes, in the estimation of the law, of equal enormity. During the struggle for power on the part of the court and the creditors, let it be recollected that bail was not allowed, even upon mesne process. Without previous notice by summons, the capias being issued as the first step in an action, the debtor was taken into immediate custody, and committed to close jail, without the means of making terms with his creditor, or employing any exertions to meet the sum demanded. In the power of his creditor, a mere equal with himself, seized by the throat, he was doomed to the most cruel bondage, and the most exorbitant exactions.

This usurped power was employed with so much abominable rigor, and to such a shameful extent, that the prisons were literally crowded.

In the reign of Henry VI., bail was permitted on mesne process. It was thus allowed at the commencement of a suit until judgment was obtained. Then the poor debtor might be confined for life. It was in the power, and was frequently the practice, of his adversary, to pronounce the sentence, as his victim entered the cell—thou shalt by no means come out thence until thou hast paid the utmost farthing. Does a system like this deserve universal abhorrence? It is the system of the present day, with some modification. So frequently have the jails in England been filled with insolvents that it has become necessary to empty them by special acts of Parliament. A general jail delivery has effected what avarice would have forever prevented. In the British annals we have accounts of the establishment of benevolent societies for the relief of these hapless men and women. One of these societies, established in London in 1772, in a period of eighteen years, with the sum of twenty-six thousand six hundred pounds sterling, rescued from wo and thrall-drom eleven thousand five hundred and forty-three persons. These had seven thousand one hundred and twelve wives, and twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-one children, making forty thousand one hundred and eighty-six persons immediate partakers of this cup of affliction. These were released, not by the humanity, not by the righteousness of the law, but by this honorable and benevolent institution. The amount paid would average about three pounds for each individual released. In every instance the society made strict inquiry into the causes which had involved the prisoners, and communicated relief only where misfortune, not crime, had produced the insolvency. Thus, eleven thousand five hundred and forty-three honest, industrious, virtuous, but unfortunate men, were deprived of liberty; seven thousand one hundred and twelve females, wives of the imprisoned, were reduced to want and wretchedness; and twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-one children abandoned to starvation or profligacy. Where is the man that can hear this story and feel not his blood curdle within him? And yet England can boast of her freedom, the rectitude of her policy, the divinity of her religion! We also profess to be Christians; we profess to love our fellow men; and how do we apologize for this foul blot? We boast of our insolvent laws, which approve not of perpetual imprisonment. What if we allow that these laws impart some relief to the system of its desolating character, its vindictive temper? By the Franklin rod, the habitation of the debtor may be protected from the lightning of Heaven; but, alas! he has no rod that can secure him from the more angry flashes, the roar of his unrelenting foe.

After such a development, if we can deny the demoralizing tendency of this system; if we can deny the barbarous cruelty of investing the creditor with power over the debtor; if we can deny that such an arrangement is subversive of civil liberty, though one were to rise from the dead, and speak with the tongue of an angel, we should not believe. It is our duty to relieve the distressed; to weep over the sorrows of our fellow-creatures; to contemplate the prison; to bring home to our own bosoms its horrors. There stands the half broken jug of feculent water; there the mouldy crust, the bed of straw. There is the sepulchre which entombs the living; there the soul broken with affliction, the soul on which despair, like the worm that never dies, is perpetually feeding. There is the dungeon where no pale of distinction is raised between the idle, the extravagant, the swindler, the felon, the assassin, and the industrious, the economical, the honest, but unfortunate child of sorrow. There are the accursed bars which separate him from the wife of his bosom, from his precious suffering babes, from his friends, from every thing which makes life worth possessing. See at the door stands insatiable avarice, with sunken eye, his keys clanking at his waist, and his iron mace on his shoulder. No supplications of a distracted wife, no tattered garments on shivering children, can excite one emotion of pity, one feeling of remorse.

And shall we, who have the power to relieve the captive, and to bind up the broken hearted, sit in complete insensibility? Shall we pronounce these dreadful realities the mere phantoms of the imagination? What are the causes which, above all others, produce and secure the prosperity of nations? Sir, they are personal liberty and personal security. The selfish principle in man must be regulated. Inordinate ambition is restrained by the Constitution and by the laws; but you give an unnatural impulse to sordid principles by arming it with the extraordinary power of vilifying a fellow-citizen by placing him in confinement for debt.

"I cannot tell what you and other men
Think of this life; but, for my single self,
I had as lief not be, as live to be
In awe of such a thing as I myself."

The love of liberty, sir, is implanted in every bosom. The deposite is safe. It can never be exterminated. It must endure as long as the high pillars of Heaven. The condition of the enslaved may suppress, for a while, the sacred passion. It may cover it with ashes, but those very ashes will preserve it. Sir, I have visited Boston. I have seen the monument, thrown up by the hand and heart of patriotism, in memory of Warren, and the brave men who fell at his side, on Bunker's Hill. I have read, with admiration and ecstasy, of the courage of our heroes at the bloody battle of Stillwater, when Burgoyne was compelled to submit to the arms of freemen. I have reflected on the sufferings, the sacrifices of the men who achieved our independence. In imagination, I have visited the powerful works which they have carried by storm. I see them bleeding—dying—yet shouting in the embrace of victory and death. I have asked myself, what is the cause, the impulse, the motive of this self-devotion, and have never been at a loss for an answer. It was the love of liberty. The passion is not like the central attraction of our earth, pulling every thing towards itself, but like the sun in the Heavens, pouring on every side life and joy. It is a passion that embraces the welfare of our own country and of all mankind. With such ideas before me, I have involuntarily exclaimed—Is it possible that this holy treasure shall be taken away from its possessor, without crime, merely for a pecuniary obligation, which misfortune alone has prevented him from discharging? No man in the Union is unexposed to the shameful degradation: no matter what have been his public services, what his private virtues, how often he has dislodged the cannon of the enemy of his country, that he might, at least, have the privilege of living a freeman. I have known instances where soldiers of the Revolution have been imprisoned upon mesne process, as well as upon execution after judgment.

It is not to be disguised that, notwithstanding this blot on our national character, we are the most free, the most happy people on earth. But what is this freedom, what this happiness, to the wretch who is doomed to dishonor and insult, to imprisonment and ruin, without the least violation of the penal code of his country, or of the moral law of Heaven. It was devotion to liberty that prompted Algernon Sydney to write against the divine right of Kings, for which service he was beheaded. It was the same fine temper which induced the virtuous Riego to contend for the Spanish Constitution, for which he suffered a death ignominious in the estimation of Kings, but most glorious in the view of every enlightened Republican. In the trying hour, it was a consolation to these distinguished patriots, that they fell by the stroke of a tyrant's rod, and that posterity would do them justice. It is the same spirit which inspires the soldier, in a country that dares be free, to suffer every hardship, to face the fiercest danger; but we are not sustained by the same cheering anticipations, since we are destroyed by that very country whose heart's blood we have resolved shall continue to flow. To the sufferer, it is the same as if he were the victim of the despotism of the crescent, or a vassal of the Holy Alliance. The unpitied mortal may say, "Alas for me—I have no country!" The resolution which the terrors of the tented field, which the rattle of musketry, and the thunder of cannon could not shake, expires within him. The soldier, the man, is entirely lost. A blameless life has no shield for him. Misfortune would plead, but she is told, by inexorable judges, the case is hopeless. Humanity would vindicate his cause, but the law has fixed his doom. His sorrows deepen, and he has no hope for relief but such as death can supply. He casts his despondent eye on the grave—"There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary are at rest. There the prisoners rest together—they hear not the voice of the oppressor. There the servant is free from his master. Wherefore is the light given to him that is in misery, and life to the bitter in soul? which long for death and it cometh not, and dig for it more than for hidden treasures; which rejoice exceedingly and are glad when they can find the grave."

We have already, in some degree, traced the origin of this man-destroying system. It is the offspring of a barbarous age—the enslaving instrument of wealth, associated with the love of power, and with principles base and sordid. We have seen that it was first adopted in England, to gratify the privileged orders—the Barons—the landed aristocracy of the country. To this day the nobility are exempt from liability to imprisonment for any pecuniary claims against them. It is the yeomanry of every country who feel the strokes of despotism—the laboring and virtuous class, upon whose industry and virtue the community must ultimately depend for safety. In the early ages of mankind, the ill-fated debtor was subject to absolute and perpetual slavery, together with his innocent wife and unoffending children. In England we can distinctly trace the progress of this hateful insult on every thing generous and good.

For many centuries imprisonment was restricted to such as were convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors. It was then extended to all civil cases, where, in fact or in law, force or violence had been used. It was then extended to the Barons, in reference to their stewards, bailiffs, and receivers of rents, as for a breach of trust or pretended fraud; and at last was employed in cases without discrimination.

Permit me, sir, to call your attention to another radical innovation, in civil proceedings, in favor of the creditor, and against the debtor. In the early periods of English liberty, the body was not only exempt from capias and imprisonment, but every plaintiff was subject to summons alone. If the debtor did not appear, an attachment, or distingas, was issued against his estate. The creditor or plaintiff was required, in every instance, as a previous condition, to give bond and security that he would prosecute his suit with effect, and that the action was neither groundless nor malicious. It was required that no man should attempt to prostitute the power of court to gratify his revenge, or to prosecute such as were entitled to equal privileges with himself. But the courts, without any legislative act, dispensed with the subpoena and distingas, which operated against the estate of the defendant, and made the capias, by which the body was taken into custody at the commencement of the suit—dispensing with the pledges of prosecution or sureties against a groundless or malicious action. By this judicial contrivance a total revolution was effected, in civil proceedings, furnishing the courts with power against the personal liberty of the debtor, that knew no restraint. And yet, sir, it is considered unreasonable by some, that we should dispense with bail on mesne process. A creditor, without being bound for costs, may institute a prosecution or action. He may do more—he may prostitute the power of the court, for the purpose of gratifying his malignant spirit, by holding the debtor to bail previous to his trial; a usage at which humanity must blush; a usage which it would seem to require the most accomplished vice to employ. If the debtor should be so afflicted as not to be able to obtain bail, he must languish in jail until his trial. He may then obtain a judgment in his favor, and his costs not secured to him.

Is this equality? Is this justice? It is such justice, such equality, that our country should be ashamed of. I ask, if the plaintiff have free access to our courts, without a pledge, or any species of restraint, is it not fairly and honestly correct to release the debtor from all bail and exposure to imprisonment, until at least a judgment shall pass against him? It is of no force to urge that a creditor may lose his claim. It is a paramount consideration that, in many cases, an innocent man may suffer a loss of liberty, without trial, and by the suggestion of a temper wholly malign. In theory, our Government recognises an equality of rights; but, in the present case, the theory is grossly violated. We admit of no privileged orders. The Constitution expressly denounces such orders. Call the people what you please, patricians or plebeians, lords or commons, only let them be equal, and free from subjection to unmerited degradation. If the nobility of England exist, without being subject to a system of shameful imprisonment, why may not the people of the United States flourish and prosper under a similar exemption?

It is an interesting employment for the mind to contemplate the moral improvement of our species, and to develop the causes which advance or retard it. In all ages, nations have more or less believed that a conflict exists between a good and an evil principle in the world. We cannot deny that, at the present crisis, a mighty struggle is going on between those who are engaged in diffusing the light of science, and diffusing the moral faculties of our race, and those who are endeavoring to keep stationary the human intellect, or to impart to it a retrograde motion.

The family of man is estimated to be eight hundred millions. Christendom is supposed to contain two hundred millions; one-half of whom, we may conclude, are under the benign influence of the Christian religion. Multitudes of these are peculiarly devoted to the service of civilizing and (in a moral view) improving mankind; and, in their various benevolent and religious institutions, assuming names which are applicable to their particular objects. It is concluded, that, at no period since the creation, have so many excellent men been employed in this illustrious project. Human character may be exalted by grand discoveries in physical science, yet the moral improvement of man is of importance infinitely higher. The former may render us more wise—more learned;—but by the latter we shall become more virtuous—more happy. It is the sacred duty of all to unite in this illustrious cause, and of each to act well his part in this interesting theatre. This view of the condition of man imposes the obligation to rescue him from every calamity that we possibly can; to meliorate his general condition, by securing that independence and freedom inviolate, which ought never to be forfeited by any other than criminal considerations. If we refuse this service, we unite with the enemies of our species. We cherish the spirit of the Holy Alliance itself, and invigorate the arm of the monarchs and tyrants of the earth, who have formed a most diabolical association for the purpose of degrading the human character, and binding the oppressed with everlasting chains.

The formidable combination to which I allude has already become almost invincible. It has navies and armies at its command; all the privileged orders are worshipping this beast; emissaries and informers, false accusers, superstitious rites, religious bigotry, prisons, dungeons, tortures; all the instruments of cruelty which gold and silver can supply,—are levied into its service. The system of imprisonment for debt constitutes a part of this formidable array against liberal principles and the rights of man. By the omission of our duty, we advance the system which we profess to condemn.

Human character is susceptible of high elevation. This fact the page of history abundantly illustrates. The public laws should have a direct tendency to encourage and reward virtue and honor—to make every citizen proud of being an American. Sustain his dignity, and you will find that he will fly to the hottest post of danger in the defence of his country. His scars will be his pride. The approbation of an enlightened and generous public will be esteemed infinitely more honorable than Isthmian or Olympian wreaths. Our progress in the science of morals, and in the science of government, has been splendid; but I ask, sir, have we arrived at that perfection that should make us content to be stationary? I am no friend to airy speculations—to schemes that are visionary;—but I wish the reform of abuses—the correction of erroneous principles—which still remain a part of our political institutions. Philosophers and statesmen have denounced imprisonment for debt; they have declared the measure unnatural and barbarous; yet the principles of freedom have not been able to destroy it. The rich are too strong for the poor—the nobility for the yeomanry. The system is, in a small degree, relaxed in our happy land, yet its form continues hideous. It is still a whirlwind, bringing desolation in its train.

But, it will be told us, sir, that the accomplishment of our wishes will be the destruction of credit. Let me demand of the objector, whether this can be a misfortune? Happy is that country where credit is restrained; where its basis is personal confidence in moral worth and the integrity of virtue. Honorable industry would then be universally pursued; nations would never become insolvent, and misfortune would enjoy a broad and glorious shield. Abolish the infamous system; set bounds to the eagerness of speculations; and a most happy change will be produced. Of all the miseries which can exist in free States, the inordinate passion for wealth is the most alarming. Entirely to check it, might be impossible, lest the spirit of enterprise become subdued. Yet nothing is so dangerous and hostile to the liberties of society, as to place, for a moment, the personal freedom of one citizen at the discretion of another. Such conduct is the disgrace of legislation. It is unnecessary, unwise, unrighteous.

In the criminal code, a radical change has been effected. Experience has demonstrated that severity and cruelty prevent not the perpetration of crime; and that the substitution of mildness, in punishment, produces the most efficacious results. The sanguinary code of Draco prepared the way for the humane laws of Solon. Instead of the horrid catalogue of crimes in England, two hundred of which are punished with death, we have substituted the gentler system of solitary confinement, of hard labor for a term of years, while capital punishment, in some of the States, is restricted to murder of the first degree, and in others, about to be totally abolished. The wisdom of the measure is unquestionable. The progress of intellect and experience is producing an entire change in the character and condition of man.

In place of the ridiculous ordeal of fire and water, we have an honorable trial by jury. Changes in the civil code have been no less remarkable. Excepting the relic of barbarism, which, I trust, the exalted sense and humane feeling of this House will forever banish from our Union, we may be said to have revived the golden age. On the question before us, the voice of the people demands respect. Their sentiment is unanimous. But for the hesitation of legislators, it would be banished eternally from our statute books. Some of our States have, by their own acts, testified their deliberate sentiment on the subject. Kentucky and North Carolina have led the way, and others will assuredly follow. Let the public voice of the National Council be heard on the subject, and the wilderness will suddenly be transformed into a fruitful field.

It has been urged, as a reason for not acting, that the jurisdiction of the Federal courts is extremely limited. The district court may take cognizance of all cases above five hundred dollars, without any condition, and even of smaller sums, provided the plaintiff will pay the cost of suit. In the West, this practice prevails. The district courts have charge of all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and in these they proceed, according to the laws of foreign courts, without regard to the execution laws of the State in which the court is located. Here, without trial by jury, the personal liberty of the citizen is subject to the process of the court. The district court, besides, constitutes our court of exchequer, and has cognizance of all revenue bonds, and various other demands against individuals, arising from the several departments of Government.

But it has been said that the courts of the United States are governed by the execution laws of each separate State. This, sir, is a mistake. The act of Congress passed in 1789, declares "that the court of the United States shall adopt the execution laws, now used or allowed in the supreme court of the State in which the Federal court is located," and to this day the principle is not settled. Upon it the most learned counsel are divided, "whether the laws for the time being, or those instituted in 1789, should govern." If the laws of 1789, then we should have the Virginia code of executions in Kentucky, which gives the people superior protection and more substantial succor than our present relief system, which has been so much declaimed against by gentlemen who have not permitted themselves to become acquainted with its real principles. By the laws of Virginia in 1789, not only was land exempt from legal process, but personal estate could not be sold for less than three-fourths of its absolute value. As to the proceedings in chancery, it has been decided that decrees exposing property to sale, as executions at common law, are not subject to the State execution law. This is the precise condition in which we are placed respecting our courts of justice, and proceedings in civil cases. So much confusion is created that no man can ascertain what is really the law of the land. When we bring this subject before Congress, we are told that the execution laws of the State govern the proceedings of the United States court within the respective States. Strange as it may appear, notwithstanding the State of Kentucky has abolished imprisonment for debt, and with it bail upon mesne process, the court of the United States requires this very bail, by rule of court, under a legislative power given them by Congress, and the clerk issues the ca. sa. to seize the body of a debtor. The same difficulty exists as to taking the benefit of the insolvent law of the State where the court is held. Procrastinations of the most troublesome character are occasioned. When the oath of insolvency is administered, the party is not called upon to present a schedule of property; he has to depose that he has not estate to the amount of thirty dollars. The act of Congress also declares that where the laws of the State authorize the ca. sa. among other executions, it may be taken out by the creditor first giving evidence of a total disregard of the liberty and personal security of the debtor. Suppose the creditor take the ca. sa. in the first place, and the debtor cannot swear that he has not thirty dollars worth of property, the consequence is, if the creditor wills it—and who ought to trust him?—PERPETUAL IMPRISONMENT.

It would constitute something like an apology for the advocates of imprisonment for debt, were some discrimination used relative to the conduct of a debtor, that he might be treated in a manner corresponding with the ideas of culpability which themselves might affix. There can be no difficulty in forming a scale of offence and punishment, at least in the contemplation of the mind, although I have no idea that you can reduce the scheme to useful practice. Fraudulent conveyance or concealment of property, luxurious extravagance, indolent habits, neglect of economy—these constitute the proper gradations in the shades of moral guilt. If gentlemen can define and punish such grades of offence, why not attempt it? Need I tell you, sir, that no effort of this nature has been employed. The besom of despotism alike sweeps before it the pearl and the pebble. The honest man and the scoundrel are sacrificed without distinction. If the friends of the vindictive system wish that innocence be protected, and only crime chastised, why not propose that, previous to holding a debtor to bail upon mesne process, the plaintiff shall give pledges of prosecution and sureties, that he has not instituted a suit with malicious intent and upon groundless accusation? Let his affidavit be demanded as to the cause of his action, one of three allegations at least, before he be allowed to require bail: that the debtor has been guilty of fraud in the original transaction by which he became indebted, or that there is danger of his absconding, or that he is about to make a fraudulent concealment or a fraudulent conveyance of his property. This would appear like justice in the proceeding. It would require something to be accomplished by the creditor before he laid violent hands on his victim. It would make him reflect, if it did not humanize his feelings.

It is difficult to conceive, upon what principle the imprisoning system rests for its support. It is not a punishment for crimes. If so, it would violate, and, in fact, does violate, all the legal forms and Constitutional safeguards of the liberty of a citizen. Its operation is not simply coercive. Unquestionably, the honorable man will present his goods and chattels. He will bid you take them all, and regret that he has no more. But the dishonest will contrive to place your proceedings at defiance. It cannot arise from an implied agreement between the parties, that, in case of failure, the debtor shall be imprisoned. Such a stipulation, whether expressed or implied, must, in law and conscience, be null and void. It cannot satisfy the debt. It may afford gratification to malignant propensities, to a vindictive disposition, to infernal feelings—but, after all, the pound of flesh cannot satisfy the bond. The whole, like Sin, in Milton, bringing forth death, is the offspring of that gloomy temper which delights to riot upon the vitals of human rights and human happiness.

When Mr. JOHNSON had concluded his remarks, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the subject was postponed till to-morrow.

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for re-printing, in one or more volumes, the annual Treasury reports, which have been made to Congress since the commencement of the Government.

Mr. VAN BUREN presented the petition of John M. S. McKnight, administrator of Charles McKnight, deceased, praying to be paid for services rendered by the deceased in the medical department, in the Revolutionary war; which was read and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile.

Mr. SEYMOUR gave notice that he would, on Thursday, ask leave to bring in a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to amend the ordinance and acts of Congress for the government of the Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to change the terms of the District Court of the United States for the Kentucky district.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the choice of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and the election of the President and Vice President of the United States; and, on motion, it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill allowing a drawback on the exportation of cordage manufactured in the United States from foreign hemp; and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The bill to regulate surveys of certain lands in the State of Alabama, was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, briefly explained the object of the bill. It was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Thomas F. Riddick, of the State of Missouri; and it was laid on the table.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for the security of public money in the hands of clerks of courts, attorneys, and marshals, and their deputies; and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, resumed the consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt.

Mr. BARBOUR addressed the Senate to the following effect :

It has been remarked by Lord Coke that he never knew a wise measure, however inauspicious the beginning, introduced into Parliament, that did not eventually succeed. A remark of this kind, from so profound an observer of the course of public affairs, offers great encouragement to the reformer of abuses. He will contend patiently, but perseveringly, with existing prejudices, animated by the assurance that his labors in a good cause will not be exerted, finally, in vain. In confirmation of this remark, I will refer to the history of this District. It was only two years past that I could carry through this body, and with great difficulty, too, a bill to change the law in force here concerning insolvent debtors. For, wonderful as it may seem, it was no less true, that, while the law enabled the inhabitants to avail themselves, after a few days' confinement, of the privilege growing out of their condition, to the stranger, who had been pursued hither by some cunning and unfeeling creditor, the privilege was denied, till he should have suffered imprisonment for twelve months. About this time, too, I have been informed, the bounds were curtailed, and many instances occurred, in consequence of their limited extent, of the inhabitants of the place being separated from their families, who depended for their daily bread on the labor of the prisoners, and who, by such curtailment, were prevented from profiting by a demand for labor, as it was to be performed beyond the bounds; but, subsequent to the discussion in this body on the subject, the court has enlarged the jail bounds commensurate with the extent of the county. But this is not all. The public mind throughout the Union has been drawn to this subject. It has made its way into the halls of the State Legislatures. In some few instances, imprisonment for debt has been already abolished, and it is to be hoped, and confidently anticipated, that every where, this stain on our statute book will be effaced; that the doors of every jail will be thrown open, and the captive set free.

Although all are aware that we have no right to interfere with the regulations of the States, and although it may be admitted that the prisoners for debt, under the process of the United States courts, are comparatively few, yet the example established by us cannot be without a salutary effect. The theory of the Constitution supposes that the counsels of this body will be directed alike by wisdom and experience. The mode of selection, and the age of the elected, are the best guarantees, that the infirmity of our nature admits, that nothing rash will be attempted here; that the consequences of a measure will be duly weighed, and nothing adopted but what has the sanction of the judgment, enlightened by the suggestions of experience; and hence, the importance of your decision on this question.

Let us, then, inquire what the question is. At this stage of the inquiry, the Senate will not suffer themselves to be embarrassed by the details of the bill. Whether it shall be prospective or retrospective—whether the provisions are sufficiently guarded, in reference to fraudulent debtors, will be the subject of future inquiry and arrangement, when the principle shall have been fully discussed and settled. Thus qualified, the question now presented for decision is simply this: Is it right to punish by imprisonment, the honest but insolvent debtor?

I grant you the power, but I deny you the moral right. I do not mean to encumber the discussion with any Constitutional question. High as the Constitution is, I appeal to an authority still higher—to the patent held by man directly from his God, by which his liberty, and the right to its enjoyment, was guaranteed. It existed before constitutions or societies themselves. The image impressed upon him at his birth was the sign of the covenant, and should have been the shield against its violation. Its preservation was the great object of the social compact. In our institutions it was so proclaimed. Every portion of our natural rights is retained, except so far as the welfare of the whole requires a sacrifice, and hence, I assume it as an axiom, that the liberty of the citizen is never forfeited to society, but by a voluntary act of the offender, or where its use has become, or threatens to become, dangerous to the public peace. Beyond these limits every infraction of this precious gift is usurpation; an act of power without right, than which nothing is more odious. If this be true, it may be justly contended that crime, or the probability of its commission, should precede a punishment which involves imprisonment. If, then, punishment presupposes crime, the advocates of imprisonment for debt must be ready to contend that insolvency is a crime. Now, although it has grown into an adage that poverty is a misfortune, the truth of which I can confirm from actual experience, yet it is a part of the same adage, that it is no crime. Mark the inconsistency in which your policy involves you! The liberty of the citizen is so far protected by the Constitution as to be placed beyond his own control. If a being, goaded by hunger and distress, or any other necessity, were base enough, like the Egyptians of old, to surrender his liberty to another, no matter how solemn the covenant, or how weighty the consideration, it is instantly cancelled by the spirit of the Constitution. Yet, without a covenant, or without a crime, you give up the unfortunate to the will of the creditor, and lend him your authority to deprive a fellow-being of his liberty. That which you will not permit directly you sanction as a consequence. Who is able to reconcile this contradiction? It is perfectly consistent with fair argument to arrive at the error of a principle through its pernicious consequences. The immediate effect of the existing policy is to confound all distinctions between the innocent and the guilty—the man of misfortune and the man of crime. If insolvency was exclusively the result of imprudence, there might be some apology for the cruelty with which the debtor is treated. But, amongst the number, how many have been the sport of events against which no human foresight could guard? Do we not know, from our own observation, that the most industrious and the most prudent are not unfrequently involved in this calamity. Who, among ourselves, can arrogantly claim an exemption from misfortune? Our lives and our substance are both held by that frail tenure which belongs to all earthly things. The proud and foolish man, surveying his vast possessions, may exclaim, Soul, take thy rest! but the echo to his boast is the awful denunciation, Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return; or the elements are commissioned to destroy, and the winds, the fire, or the flood, in an instant prostrate his earthly hopes. In these dispensations of an inscrutable Providence, to which all are alike subject, but from which, for the present, we may be happily exempt, let us be taught the necessity of bearing with humility our prosperity; but let not that exemption steel our hearts against the unfortunate—their cup of life is made sufficiently bitter by their misfortunes—'tis cruelty alone that will administer an additional drug. And yet these victims of misfortune are the subjects of your punishment.

What, let me ask, is the legitimate object of punishment? The reformation of the offender, or to restrain him from violence? Reform the prisoner! In what? Does any man desire to become insolvent? If there be any one thing about which all mankind agree, it is in the wish to better his condition. This wish is implanted in our nature, and grows with our growth. Can you increase it by punishment; or can it be necessary for the peace of society to restrain his liberty the man whose only crime is his misfortune?

How are these weighty considerations against the existing policy met by its friends? It is urged by them that the evil complained of has been exaggerated—that the sufferers are but few—that the moral sense of mankind revolts at the imprisonment of an honest debtor. Is this so? Then there is an end of the question. You can have no difficulty in changing a system so unjust and so cruel, that none are found wicked enough to carry it into execution. Why disgrace your statute book with such a law? It is but an evidence of your insensibility to the character of your code. But, unfortunately for the gentleman who thus argued, the moral sense of mankind is not what he supposes. Let us look at facts. Take the document exhibited yesterday by my honorable friend from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON)—it is the record of the jail in Boston, the metropolis of the very State whose representative on this floor reposes on the moral sense of mankind as a sufficient shield against any abuse under the existing law. In recurring to this document, I intend nothing that is invidious—I presume Boston is not more remarkable for the number of its insolvent debtors, or the severity of creditors, than any other part of the United States. Indeed, a member from New York, at the last session, exhibited a similar document from the jails of New York. Taking this document as the rule by which to estimate the number of sufferers in the United States, what a picture of human misery does it exhibit. In a population of 40,000, the number of souls in Boston, there were committed in 1820, one thousand four hundred and forty-two; in 1821, one thousand two hundred and eighty-one; and in the three first quarters of 1823, seven hundred and sixty-nine—making a proportion of one-thirtieth of the whole population, which has suffered imprisonment for debt, and among this number, in the whole time, four hundred and thirty females. This, then, is a specimen of the moral sense of the people of Boston, and, as I have assumed, of the United States. By which rule, after every reasonable deduction for the difference between populous towns and the country, it may be safely affirmed that 13,000 human beings are annually incarcerated for debt in the United States. When we add to this the wives and children of the sufferers, if our sympathy is to be thus limited to the exclusion of more distant relatives, we may fairly conclude that 60,000 people are annually involved directly and indirectly in the mischiefs resulting from this barbarous policy. If the scope of the evil then has been exaggerated, it cannot be from a misrepresentation of the number of the sufferers. Is it in the extent of their sufferings? Where is the barometer by which these can be weighed? Has the Senator from Massachusetts, or any of you, visited these abodes of wretchedness, whose silence is interrupted only by the sighs and groans of the victims? or, peradventure, by the aspiration of some broken heart, penetrating with the eye of hope the dark cloud that surrounds human things, and looking to a better world, “where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest?” Of these dreary abodes, it may well be said, as of the grave—

Darkness, death, and long despair,
Reign in eternal silence there.

The sensibility of mankind is a subject of curious speculation. Let some ideal case of misfortune be touched by the hand of a master—some great unknown—although the theatre of suffering be the Ultima Thule of the habitable globe, and although centuries have intervened, yet every page will be bedewed with the sympathetic tear—while we hear, without emotion, of the real sufferings of thousands, if, perchance, they are our immediate neighbors and contemporaries.

What flight of fancy—what power of description—could add a shade to the dark picture of human affliction, exhibited in this already alluded to document? A husband and a father is snatched from his family at the moment when the wife is suffering and in peril, and that very situation the cause of the arrest, with a view to practice on the humanity of others! Yes! torn from a wife and nine children, dependent for their existence on the daily labor of the debtor. The creditor is con-jured to relax his rigor. Shylock-like, he turns a deaf ear to the supplication—the wife falls a victim, the children live on charity. But, atrocious as is this case, it yields in enormity to another. Where a widowed mother is imprisoned by a brutal creditor, as an obstacle to his detestable purposes against an unprotected daughter. But for cases so singularly marked by unmixed cruelty and villany, we should have had ample occasion to dwell on other instances alluded to in the document. Take, however, one more—it is that, where a man, in a State coterminous to Massachusetts, was confined thirty years. So long had been his interment in jail, that he was forgotten by all his contemporaries. When discharged, as he was, finally, by the humanity of others, the expenses of his confinement were $3,000.

Among the victims, we are told, there were four hundred and thirty females. There is something, sir, so exquisitely horrible in contemplating such a mass of female wretchedness, that I have no language in which to give utterance to my feelings. Opposed, as I am in principle, to the imprisonment of a man for debt, I am a hundred fold so in regard to a woman. The distribution of civil rights between the sexes, gives all to the one and nothing to the other. Where privileges are concerned, the woman is scarcely considered as a sentient being; she is quickened into life, and an independent existence acknowledged only when she is to become the subject of imprisonment, of penalties, and of pains.

Now, sir, let it be admitted, that, among this number of females, a proportion, and a large one, if you will, are the victims of vice. It is not charitable to suppose all are so. Take from the group the widow of some honest mechanic, worthy and virtuous—for these qualities belong alike to every condition—as often found in the cottage as in the palace—whose husband, when alive, brought the avails of his daily labor to his humble roof, where his wife performed her every duty; “on her tongue is the law of kindness; her children rise up and call her blessed—her husband also, and he praiseth her;” but he is snatched from her by the hand of death. Thus bereaved, she resorts to her scanty means to feed and clothe her little ones. She redoubles her efforts—she wastes her strength over the midnight lamp, “and, with untasted food, she plies her care.” But all will not do. The cruel creditor comes—she is unable to pay—the jail is her portion—the grave is her only refuge from calamity, given in the mercy of God to the sons and daughters of affliction. Her children, naked and hungry, beg the bread of life. Equally subject to this deplorable fate are your patriots and your heroes—men who have guided your counsels by their wisdom, or conducted your armies to victory—men who have consecrated the liberty you enjoy by their blood, and whose very sacrifices for the country have been the sole cause of their peniless condition. These, too, find their career terminate in a jail; and, while their ears are greeted with the hosannas to freedom—a freedom which they in part achieved—their portion is a loathsome captivity. Gloomy and dark as this picture is, think it not the mere offspring of a heated and unchastened imagination. The facts before you, as well as those mentioned by my friend from Kentucky, as coming within his own knowledge, have lost a portion of their sombre character in the description. And is this your boasted land of liberty, where enormities like these are committed in the name of the law! Sir, there is a consideration presents itself here, far beyond the interest of creditor or debtor. The policy of free governments should, by every means, cherish among the people the liveliest regard for the liberty of the citizen. Whatsoever is common, either in the physical or moral world, ceases to be striking. From the unnumbered victims of the policy I am denouncing, the impression on the mind, when a fellow-being is led to captivity, is as feeble as that produced by the rising or the setting sun; the sense of public feeling becomes blunted, and the loss of liberty is classed among your every day occurrences. The essence of liberty consists in the consciousness of its possessor, that, if he be not criminal, it is surrounded by an unapproachable inviolability. Held at the nod of a worm like ourselves, (if it be not profanation to call a thing thus held liberty,) it becomes valueless and contemptible. In confirmation of the sentiment that liberty itself, in the eye of mankind, is depreciated by the frequency of its violation, let us refer to our formerly bloody criminal code. We saw death, itself, as a capital punishment, from its indiscriminate infliction, and from its daily occurrence, lose its terrors. Since, however, wisdom and humanity have united in graduating a just scale of punishments and crimes, that of death, from its rare occurrence, strikes the mind as an impressive and awful spectacle.

Let, then, the liberty of the citizen, like his life, be preserved from daily and wanton violation—its value will increase in the estimation of the people, and its loss strike with little less effect than the loss of life itself.

Let us next inquire into the mass of suffering which I have shown to you to exist—the unalterable condition of our kind. Is it a sacrifice to which poor human nature must submit? Is it a lesser evil compensated by a greater good? I call upon the friends of the existing policy to answer these questions. They reply—it is to enforce the recovery of debts. Of whom? Not of him who is to be protected by this bill. For it is only the honest debtor, who has faithfully surrendered the last vestige of his property to his creditor, who can profit by its provisions. The fraudulent debtor is placed in a worse situation. Close jail, deprived of his bounds, is his doom, by the bill. If this be not sufficient, in due time, propose other and severer enactments. I will go all lengths to punish him. But, if you hold not to bail, the fraudulent will escape. What doctrine is this? You are to punish, indiscriminately, lest the guilty should escape. How long has this been the principle of legislation? We are taught, from the highest of all possible authority, that nine guilty men should escape rather than that one innocent should suffer. The rule, it seems, is now to be reversed. But it is urged that an honest debtor would have no difficulty in giving bail. Indeed! I fear the gentleman is calculating fallaciously again, on the moral sense, or, if you please, the friendship of mankind. Friendship, or rather its professions, are too often tendered where they are not wanting—to wealth, rarely to distress. They are the blossoms of the sunshine, but wither in the adverse blast. For—“What is friendship but a name,

A charm that lulls to sleep;
A shade, that follows wealth or fame,
And leaves the wretch to weep?”

But let all this pass for nothing. Let it be granted that the world has been regenerated; that those who were not the world's friends formerly, have become so by some prodigy, no matter what—still, I demand to know, whence do you derive the right to throw a freeman on the courtesy of a friend to save him from imprisonment, on the mere suggestion of another that he is in debt? In all criminal cases, no matter how atrocious may be the crime with which the accused is charged, he is presumed innocent, till the contrary appears; and that, too, by testimony, on oath, of credible and disinterested witnesses. Of him you never require bail, till a presumption of guilt is made satisfactorily to appear. But charge a man with debt—even by an interested party—you presume him guilty—that his purposes are fraudulent, and deprive him of his liberty, if he does not instantly give sponsors for the delivery of his body into court! Now, let us imagine that it was proposed to remove the ramparts which the wisdom of our ancestors has erected for the security of our innocence, by enacting that, on a mere accusation of crime, without testimony, a citizen might be arrested—could you listen, with patience, to the suggestion that it ought to be adopted, lest the guilty should escape? I am persuaded you would cry out, with one voice, Let ninety and nine guilty men escape, rather than that one innocent man should thus suffer. But waive, if you please, this consideration. Let us be insensible to the wanton violation of the liberty of the citizen—let us shut ourselves against the suffering of the captive—let us harden our hearts against the violation of decorum, in consigning to the same cell men and women, and mixing with both the atrocious malefactor—let all these things, for the moment, be forgotten, and discuss the question as one of dollars and cents. How will the account stand? Referring to the document already alluded to, it appears, in 2,084 cases, the costs of commitment exceeded the principal; and those paid by the creditor. Add to this the loss of labor to society, by the confinement of the debtors, and compare this amount to that which the creditor receives, by this mode of punishment. One case in a thousand, perhaps, is productive of some benefit to the creditor—and that, generally, the result of the generosity of others. And should this exception lessen our abhorrence for the policy? Some swindling adventurer may find his account in pampering the prodigality of a wayward son, in the calculation of reaching, through the imprisonment of the child, the sensibilities of the father. Friendship may sometimes be burdened, in the release of an unfortunate friend. But are these calculations worthy of your protection? Is it right to arm villainy with an instrument, by which to torture the best feelings of the human heart? Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that, could a balance be struck, with an exclusive eye to the creditor, of profit and loss, notwithstanding his power over the debtor's body, and the myriad of instances in which it has been exercised, that he himself has been greatly loser—disregarding, entirely, the sufferings of the imprisoned, as well as the infinite injury to society. And here sir, I would hazard a general remark. It may be advanced, as an unquestionable truth, that crimes are multiplied in every community, where the infamy attending their perpetration is lessened, by the circumstance that their punishment is common to misfortune as well as to guilt. For example, if it was a fundamental principle, in your code, that no man should be deprived of his liberty but for crimes, in which I class fraud, public opinion would, at once, associate guilt with imprisonment; and, as a consequence, many who now might be disposed to defraud their creditors, from the hope of escaping, unnoticed, among the honest and unfortunate, would, then, from the fear of being singled out to abide, alone, the infamy of their condition, find a sufficient motive to abstain from executing their fraudulent designs. If there be any force in these views, I have already met the other objection urged against the principle of the bill—its tendency to diminish credit. Sir, I do not mean, because it is unnecessary, to enter, at all, into the much-contested question—as to the influence of extensive credit on the interests of society. I have removed all the difficulty, growing out of this view of the subject, by showing that the creditor himself will profit by depriving him of a power which, in its practical effects, has been, to him, productive of loss. One remark, however, I will hazard, on the general subject; and that is, that the legitimate objects of confidence or credit, are, the integrity of the debtor, or his competency to pay, or both. And that, if a creditor be not content with these, and extend his calculation to the body of his debtor, he deserves any thing but our protection. Although there may be cases of this kind, and the existence of which I have already admitted, no instance is avowed in modern times, except that to which my classical hearers will readily refer, where, in the face of the bond, the flesh was pledged as the guarantee to punctuality. The universal reprobation of mankind bestowed on this case, supposed to exist only in the poet's imagination, is due in nearly the same degree to him who, though not avowedly, yet secretly looks to a security little less horrible—the captivity of his debtor.

The mischief, of which I complain, is the undisputed progeny of a barbarous age. It is antiquity only, that shelters it from reprobation. And, were it now, for the first time proposed, it would be every where received with marked disapprobation.

But there is a species of idolatry common to all mankind. It is not in religion only that it is manifested; it displays itself on a variety of occasions; and in none more conspicuously than in clinging to ancient practices. We read now, indeed, with horror, of the treatment of the debtor, in the best days of the Roman Republic. There, the insolvent debtor's body was cut up, as you now do the carcass of an ox, and a part was given to the creditor, proportioned to his demand. As a supposed mitigation to this barbarous practice, the debtor, his wife, and children, were sold into bondage, and the avails distributed among the creditors. We read now of those things with horror, partly because these abominations have long since ceased to exist. But, had they still prevailed, especially in England, they would have lost, in our eyes, half their atrocity. I feel justified in so saying, when I refer to punishments in criminal cases, even now inflicted in many parts of the United States, though not so enormously disproportionate to the offence, yet so repugnant to humanity, that they never could be retained, but for the example of our ancestors. That to this example we are indebted for the remaining fragment of this barbarous policy, I am persuaded none will deny. I at the same time admit that many grains of allowance are due to us. Those who usually legislate for us, are generally disciples of Mr. Justice Blackstone—whose opinions on municipal law, from their youth, they were taught to consider as infallible. He, it is well known, is the encomiast of whatever prevails in England. And why should he not? He was of the favored few who fed liberally on the bounty of his country, which has a wonderful tendency to reconcile one to the existing state of things. Now, for myself, however arrogant it may seem, I must be permitted to say that the time has long past by, when I implicitly adopted opinions on the authority of a name. Experience has taught me the necessity of judging for myself—as I have often found very serious heresies sheltered by the fame of their authors; and the truth has been irresistibly forced upon me, that a great man inverts the general law of optics, by looming most advantageously at a distance. On the policy of England, as to imprisonment for debt, Blackstone indulges in his usual complimentary style. But the courtier is bad authority on the abuses of Government. Let us ascertain the policy he thus commends, and judge for ourselves. There, the debtors are confined without any limitation as to time. Both sexes, not unfrequently, promiscuously huddled together, presenting a scene of whatever is loathsome and abominable to the eye of the beholder—twenty thousand of whom are supposed to fall, annually, a sacrifice to this barbarous practice. But, notwithstanding this waste of human life, the jails continue to fill to overflowing, when, from necessity, an act of general jail delivery is passed by Parliament—by which the wretched survivors, squalid with filth, and corrupted by communion, are again thrown on the lap of society—fit and ruthless instruments of vengeance, in the hands of retributive justice, to chasten that society from which they have endured such multiplied wrongs. I appeal from the authority of the Judge, to their own poet, who gives you a vivid portrait of these abodes of wretchedness, in which he himself had been a sufferer:

“Unpitied and unheard, where misery mourns,
Where sickness pines, where thirst and hunger burn,
And poor misfortune feels the lash of vice:
While, in the land of liberty, the land
Whose every street and public meeting glow
With open freedom, little tyrants rag’d,
Snatch’d the lean morsel from the starving mouth,
Tore from cold wintry limbs the tatter’d weed;
Even robb’d them of the last of comforts, sleep:
The free-born Briton to the dungeon chain’d;
Or, as the lust of cruelty prevail’d,
At pleasure marked him with inglorious stripes,
And crush’d out lives, by secret, barb’rous ways,
That, for their country, would have toil’d or bled.”

These are the fruits of that system which you have every where, with slight modifications, servilely copied in the United States, and which I now solicit you to abandon.

There is nothing in my nature (and I may be permitted to add, in my situation) which would induce me to indulge in an adventurous scheme of legislation. But the age in which we live demands that we fearlessly approach every evil, and boldly probe it to its source. Antiquity, of itself, is no longer sufficient to protect its errors. Our fathers thus reasoned, when they gave birth to our freedom and our free institutions.

The maxims of Europe should no longer be authority to us. In the career of political improvement she is a sightless distance in the rear. Of the thousand instances to which reference might be had, in confirmation of this truth, take that of religious freedom. It is held there, as a sacred maxim, which it would be deemed impious to question, that a union between the State and the favored sect is indispensable to the existence of the Government and religion. In the most favored spot, a wretched toleration is all that is indulged; while in another portion we are informed their adorable King (whether with or without the direction of his Holy Allies we are not advised) is now seriously deliberating on the restoration of the Inquisition.

Let us turn from a scene at which the heart sickens, to our own favored land, to do honor to the counsels of our fathers, while we are enjoying their beneficent results. JEFFERSON (a name ever dear to freedom) was the author, not only of the Declaration of Independence, but of unreserved equality to all religious sects. Animated by a holy zeal for the happiness of his species, and guided by the polarity of his own superior genius, to him the high privilege was given of exploring the hitherto untrodden path of political science. In the eyes of this great Apostle of Liberty, the hoary errors of Europe dwindled into contempt, and a dissolution between the Church and State was the result of his efforts. Have the fears of the timid opponents of that measure been realized? No. The world has beheld, for the first time, the realization of that promise whose charity announces the divinity of its origin. The partition wall between the Jew and the Gentile has in very truth been broken down. Instead of an insolent and hypocritical hierarchy, eating out the substance of the land, and looking down with contempt on the remainder of mankind, the messengers of the Gospel here go out with the meekness and in the spirit of their great prototype, depending (and not in vain) on the voluntary aid of their followers, inculcating with sincerity and zeal the sublimest truths of their religion, and practising what they preach. Here religion no longer seeks to erect its altars upon the ignorance of mankind, and propagate its doctrines by fire and the sword. Reason has been substituted for superstition, charity for persecution. Members of different creeds sit down together, and participate at the same table of the awful mysteries of their religion; and every where we hear inculcated, from the metropolis to the wilderness, throughout all our borders, “On earth peace, good will towards men.” This is the fruit of the counsels of our fathers.

Go on, then, and complete the work they have so nobly begun. Let us erase from our code this barbarous relic, and whatever else is mischievous.

To us, in part, a great trust has been confided—the welfare of the country, and of generations yet to come; nay, the world itself looks to us as to a great example, whence to draw the oracles of political truth. Fill, then, the measure which has been assigned you. Never tire till there is nothing to be done; and when you shall have reared a monument of beneficent legislation, if it be in the order of Providence that we too, in our turn, shall be involved in the darkness of slavery and superstition, let us hope that our labors, though obscured for a season in the general gloom, may survive the eclipse, and become the guide of some future deliverer of his country.

When Mr. BARBOUR had concluded, on motion of Mr. MILLS, the subject was postponed till Friday next.

The bill for the relief of Amasa Stetson, was taken up; but, before acting upon it, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Navy, with the annual statement of the appropriations and expenditures for the naval service, for the year 1823, and a paper showing the expenditures under each head since the 1st of January, 1824, and the unexpended balances of appropriations on the 1st February, 1824. The report was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill to regulate the surveying of the public and private lands in the southern part of Alabama, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile; which was twice read, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill for the relief of Sarah Venable and Jane Morgan; and the bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts, were severally read the second time; and the last mentioned bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the petition of Ebenezer Oliver and others; and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Obadiah Jones; and it was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. ELLIOTT presented the petition of Andrew Low and others, of Savannah, praying to be released from the payment of certain custom-house bonds; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Henry M. Johnson; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, to instruct the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of reprinting the annual Treasury reports; and agreed thereto.

AMASA STETSON.

The bill reported by the Committee on Claims, for the relief of Amasa Stetson, was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Stetson was a deputy Commissary General, at Boston, during the late war. He claims to be reimbursed moneys which he advanced, as interest, for the Government, for purchases made under positive orders; losses which he sustained on Treasury notes paid to him for advances which he had actually made in specie; and for extensive and responsible services performed, which did not come within the requisite duties of his office. For all these different items he claims about $12,000. The committee report that, in their opinion, of Mr. Stetson ought to be allowed "the sum of $2,031 49, being for interest paid by him for money loaned for the use of the Government;" and that "they believe that no more than justice will be done him, by granting him the pay and emoluments of an issuing commissary, for three years and three months and one third of a month, amounting to $3,615 67." The bill, therefore, proposes to pay him $5,700 16.

Mr. MILLS moved to recommit the bill, with instructions so to modify it as to make provision for allowing the whole amount claimed by the petition, and followed his motion with an argument to show the equity and reasonableness of the whole claim of the petitioner.

This motion gave rise to a debate of much length, on the merits of the case; in which Mr. RUGGLES (chairman of the Committee of Claims) opposed the motion to recommit the bill, and sustained the report of the committee; and Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, and MILLS, maintained the opposite side of the question, and urging in his behalf facts, highly creditable to the patriotism and disinterestedness of the official conduct of the petitioner. Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, made some remarks on the difficulty of ascertaining the real facts of such cases, by the Senate, and adverse to the claims set up by the petitioner. Messrs. LANMAN, LLOYD, of Massachusetts, and LOWRIE, also advocated the claim to a greater or less extent. To all these gentlemen Mr. RUGGLES replied, and the question being taken on the recommitment of the bill, it was carried—yeas 22, nays 15; and after some further discussion, on the part of Messrs. SMITH, LLOYD, of Massachusetts, D'WOLF, RUGGLES, MILLS, and others, as to the precise nature of the instructions to go to the committee.

The Senate went into consideration of Executive business, and soon after adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 19.

The bill to change the terms of the district court of the United States, for the Kentucky district; and the bill to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands; were severally read the second time.

On motion, by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the consideration of the petitions of Moses Wing, of Israel R. Potter, and Eleanor Tansey.

On motion, by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Cornelius Huson, and, on his motion, the said motion was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, Jumonville de Villier had leave to withdraw his petition and papers, presented at the first session of the Seventeenth Congress.

Mr. MILLS presented the memorial of William Rotch, junior, and others, merchants, of New Bedford, praying indemnification for depredations committed on their commerce by the public and private armed vessels of France, between the years 1793 and 1800. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the petition of Ebenezer Oliver, and others; and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Florida," with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to their amendments to the last mentioned bill, and concurred therein.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill regulating the transportation of gold and silver bullion, specie and jewels, and carrying of passengers, and to prohibit the receipt of merchandise, in the public vessels of the United States; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

OBADIAH JONES.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Obadiah Jones. The petitioner, a receiver of public moneys, in Alabama, prays that he may be indemnified for the loss of $495, belonging to the Government, which was stolen from him, and for which he has been required to account.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, opposed the report of the committee. He stated the circumstances under which the robbery was committed, to show that the loss did not arise from any negligence of the petitioner, who sustains, as Mr. K. stated, a high character for integrity, and vigilance in the duties of his office.

Mr. RUGGLES supported the report of the committee, on the ground that, in this instance, the loss had occurred from the want of proper care and vigilance in keeping the public money; that the petitioner receives a salary which compensates him for all the risks he incurs; and that there was not sufficient proof of his loss.

Some further remarks were made by Messrs.

VAN DYKE, CHANDLER, SMITH, MILLS, KELLY, BELL, and NOBLE.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved that the report be recommitted, with instructions to report a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the petitioner the sum of $495, on proof being adduced, to the satisfaction of said Secretary, that the money was in fact stolen, without fault on the part of the petitioner. Mr. K. supported, and Mr. RUGGLES opposed, this motion. It was rejected; and the report of the committee was then agreed to.

FRIDAY, February 20.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Postmaster General, with a list of the unproductive post roads, for the year 1823. The report was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the payments made at the Treasury for the discharge of miscellaneous claims, during the year 1823; the contracts and purchases made by collectors, for the revenue service, during the year 1822; the expenditures, on account of sick and disabled seamen, during the year 1822; and the contracts made, relative to oil, lighthouses, beacons, buoys, stakeages, &c.

Mr. TALBOT communicated the remonstrance of the Legislature of Kentucky against the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Green, and others, against Biddle, at the last term, declaring the act of that State, of the 27th February, 1797, concerning occupying claimants of land, and the act amendatory thereof, passed 31st January, 1812, to be unconstitutional and void; representing the principle therein proclaimed as an infringement of the sovereignty of the State; and requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their best exertions to procure the passage of a law requiring the concurrence of two-thirds of the judges of that court, in all cases involving the validity of a law of any State, or an increase of the number of the judges. The remonstrance was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANCH presented the memorial of David Wallace, senior, praying indemnification for depredations committed on his property by the public and private armed vessels of France, between the years 1793 and 1800. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill for the relief of Amasa Stetson, with instructions to make a further allowance for interest, reported the same, with an amendment. The committee propose an additional section, allowing a further sum of about two thousand five hundred dollars, for interest on moneys advanced, &c.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted, with instructions, the petition of John Forbes and Co., and of John McAlister, reported a bill releasing to John McAlister, or the legal representatives of John Forbes, a certain tract of land; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SEYMOUR asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill in addition to an act entitled "An act to amend the ordinance and acts of Congress for the government of the Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes;" which was twice read, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel White, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Samuel White. The report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. TALBOT, the bill for the relief of James Johnson, of Kentucky, was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. This bill proposes to allow Mr. Johnson, who was a paymaster in a regiment of volunteers, during the late war, a credit in the settlement of his accounts with the Government, for moneys paid for rations, more than was allowed by the law fixing the price of rations. After a few remarks by Messrs. TALBOT, CHANDLER, SMITH, WILLIAMS, and JACKSON, the bill was reported to the Senate, without amendment, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile, reported it without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. KING, of Alabama, that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the consideration of the petition of James Ore, the said motion was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill for the better security of public moneys in the hands of marshals, clerks, and attorneys; and, after some discussion by Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, MILLS, and VAN DYKE, the bill, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill to abolish imprisonment for debt was taken up. Mr. VAN BUREN proposed two new sections, as substitutes for the first and fourth sections of the bill. The amendments were ordered to be printed, and the whole subject was postponed till Monday next, and made the order of that day.

ROADS IN FLORIDA.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill entitled "An act to authorize the laying out and opening certain public roads in the Territory of Florida."

The bill proposes an appropriation of twenty thousand dollars for the purpose of making a road from Pensacola to St. Augustine, and three thousand dollars for the purpose of surveying routes for two other roads intersecting said Territory at different points.

Mr. BROWN stated that the distance over which the road was proposed to be made, was about three hundred miles; and the distance to be surveyed for the two other roads would be about six hundred miles. It was of great importance to have a communication opened along the coast of that Territory. The inhabitants, living under the same government, were widely separated from each other. The proposed road will pass through a very fine and fertile country, mostly belonging to the Government of the United States. It appeared to the committee to be necessary that something should be done to increase the value of this property. The trustees of that Territory require protection from the Government, and this measure will accelerate its settlement. As the sum appropriated was not very great, he hoped the bill would pass.

Mr. JACKSON said this road was of great importance, from two considerations—the first, as it related to the defence, and the second, in regard to the population of that part of the country. If gentlemen would recur to the map of that part of the Territory, they would perceive that it would be absolutely impossible to succor St. Augustine, except by water. The road could be made at a small expense, and would furnish the means of immediate defence. He thought the United States ought to keep an eye on that part of the country—it is now very weak and defenceless. Without this road, people could not be induced so speedily to emigrate to that Territory, and its settlement would be retarded.

Mr. LOWRIE said there were two objects specified in this bill, which the gentleman had not touched upon—the surveys of two other routes, besides the one where the road was to be made. He wished information on those points; as three thousand dollars was appropriated for the surveys, while only twenty thousand dollars was to be granted for making the other road.

Mr. BROWN, in explanation, remarked that the contemplated routes, which were to be surveyed, embraced an extent of six hundred miles; while the road to be made was only three hundred. Those routes which were to be traced out, touch at different parts of the Territory, the communication with which is highly important.

Mr. LOWRIE inquired of the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, what data the committee had adopted, in estimating the expenditures for these purposes.

Mr. BROWN said the committee had before them the statements furnished by the delegate who represented that Territory in the other House. From these, and such information as could be gained from the map of that country, the estimates were made.

Mr. JACKSON did not doubt that the appropriation provided in this bill, with the labor of the military force stationed in that part of the country, would be adequate to the proposed objects—he said that, by this means, a topographical view of the country through which the roads were to run, would be obtained; and the President would not apply more money to the purpose than should be found necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER thought that must be a very extraordinary country indeed, if twenty thousand dollars would make three hundred miles of road in it. We have been told that the soldiers could not work in that country. Mr. C. believed that, if twenty thousand dollars were appropriated now, it would not be a great while before Congress would be called upon, to vote more money for this object.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, could hardly believe that fifty or sixty dollars a mile, which was all the sum mentioned in the bill would amount to, would be sufficient to make this road. He felt in favor of making a road from Pensacola to St. Augustine, but wished to know what the real cost of such a road would be. How much it would cost in money, and how much labor the soldiers could perform. He wished to know if the committee had estimated the cost. When appropriations are to be made, an estimate is generally required. When a lighthouse or a pier is to be built, the committee is called upon for an estimate. He thought the Government were going too far in this business, in making out these two roads of three hundred miles each. The distance, considering the sinuosities of the road, might be a great deal more than was calculated. If the survey is made, we shall be called upon, some time or other, to make the roads also. Mr. H. thought it would be much better to begin by making the road from Pensacola to St. Augustine; they are united under one government, the operations of which require that there should be a communication between the two places. He was, therefore, in favor of that part of the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT said, that he was not surprised that gentlemen who came from a part of the country where roads were made in a very different manner, should think the sum mentioned in this bill too small for the contemplated purpose. In that part of the country where the roads must be rendered perfectly hard, so as to secure them from the operation of the frost, the expense would, undoubtedly, be much greater. But, in the section where this road is to be located, all that is done is to fell the trees, and excavate ditches by the side of the road. There is no need of any great quantity of material. He believed ten thousand dollars would be sufficient to fell the timber, and lay out the road. The most important difficulty is the swamps through which the road must pass; the timber is rolled into them, as it is cut down, and the mud is filled in from the ditches. These are our roads. They are not like those in the North, and hence they do not cost as much money. He believed that twenty thousand dollars, with the services of the military, would be amply sufficient. With regard to the surveys to be made for the other roads, the population of the country would be greatly facilitated by opening these communications. They pass through a wilderness, in which it is only necessary to fell the timber, and those who pass upon the road will make it. We have only to mark out the way. In the event of war, it would be very important, as furnishing opportunities for an army to pass with celerity. Mr. E. thought it absolutely necessary, for the welfare of that part of the country, that this bill should be adopted; the country would then be open to the inspection of persons who wish to settle there. It is now in a very exposed situation; it may be called the piquet of the Union; and shall we suffer it to remain defenceless? As this measure would furnish facilities for investigating the country, and means for its defence, Mr. E. hoped it would be agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON said he had himself marched through a considerable part of that Territory, and was enabled to open roads at the rate of twenty miles a day. If an army was able to open a road at that rate, he believed that twenty thousand dollars would be a sufficient sum for this purpose. He had no doubt that it would be sufficient, unless bridges were to be made over the streams, which he believed was not intended.

Mr. BROWN said that, as the gentleman from Maine wished for estimates, as they were furnished in regard to lighthouses, &c., he could inform him, in relation to the surveys to be made in Florida, it was estimated that they would cost five dollars per mile; that surveyors in that section of the country would trace out roads at the rate of three dollars the mile; and the committee calculated that five dollars a mile would defray the whole expense. The utility of these surveys, he thought, was unquestionable, as they served as guides to travellers who explore the country. The soil is so dry, and so easy to be worked, that he believed the expense would not be more than the sum proposed in the bill.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment; and, upon its passage to a third reading, Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays, which were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Branch, Brown, Eaton, Edwards of Connecticut, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Mills, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, Van Buren, Ware, Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Knight, Macon, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke—8.

So the bill passed to a third reading.

MONDAY, February 23.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of War, with a report of the Second Auditor, relative to the accounts for disbursements in the Indian Department, for the year ending 30th September, 1823; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, to consider and report thereon.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Postmaster General, with the number, names, and salaries, of the clerks employed in his office, during the year 1823.

rial was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented the petition of Lewis A. Tarascon, and others, praying the opening of a wagon road from the river Missouri, north of the river Kansas, to the river Columbia; which was read, and referred to the select committee on roads and canals.

Mr. NOBLE communicated the following resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, viz:

Resolved, by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the reasons of the compact between the General Government and this State, by which this State guaranteed an exemption from taxation of all lands, for five years from and after the purchase thereof, purchased of the General Government after the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, have, by the act of Congress changing the whole land system, totally ceased.

Resolved, That the right of taxation, on the part of this State, from and after the day of sale, cannot, by any possibility, be injurious to the interests of the United States.

Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and our Senators instructed, to use their utmost exertions to obtain a repeal, or modification, of the compact between the United States and this State, as referred to in the foregoing resolution.

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress, and a copy to each of our Senators and Representatives.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Eaton, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read, and ordered to be printed.

On motion, by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Holden W. Prout, administrator of Joshua W. Prout.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Lewis A. Petray and Just Viel, and of Napier, Rapelye, and Bennett, made separate reports, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Napier, Rapelye, and Bennett, and Petray and Viel. The reports and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading; and the reports were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAYNE presented the memorial of William Elliott, and others, styling themselves a committee in behalf of the inhabitants of Beaufort, South Carolina, protesting against the imposition of any additional duties on imports; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BARTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate, what measures have been taken to procure and lay before the Senate, at this session of Congress, the originals, or copies, of all the contracts for surveying the public lands, made by the Surveyor General of Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, since the first day of January, 1819, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, adopted on the 25th of February, 1823; and at what time said contracts, or copies thereof, will probably be laid before the Senate, in pursuance of said resolution.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read:

Resolved, That the following rule be added to the rules of the Senate:

The yeas and nays shall be required, on the final vote on every act, in the three last days of every session.

The resolution was ordered to a second reading.

JAMES ORE, &c.

The motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, submitted some days since, that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James Ore, was taken up. This petitioner holds a tract of land, under the eighth article of the treaty of 8th July, 1817, with the Cherokee tribe of Indians, reserving to each of the heads of families residing on the territory ceded by that treaty, a life estate in a tract of six hundred acres of land, the fee simple to go to their children; these titles to be forfeited in case they leave the land. The petitioner prays that the fee simple to the land may be vested in him.

Mr. KELLY opposed the motion, on the grounds that the principles which had been adopted in extinguishing the Indian title by purchase, and a fair regard to the character of contracts, ought to give the fee simple to the holders of the land, instead of their descendants; that most of the Indians were now so far civilized, as to be competent to take due care of their property; and if they should not prove good neighbors, their land might be bought from them, if they were invested with the title, so far as to be able to dispose of it; as it stood at present, they were compelled to remain upon the land, or to forfeit their title. He was, therefore, opposed to discharging the Committee.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, briefly supported the motion to discharge. And the motion was then agreed to.

The bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States, and providing for the discipline thereof; the bill releasing to John McAlister, or the legal representatives of John Forbes, a certain tract of land; and the bill for the relief of Samuel White, were severally read the second time.

The bill for the relief of James Johnson was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the laying out and opening certain public roads in the Territory of Florida," was read the third time, and passed.

informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1824," and a bill, entitled "An act giving the consent and sanction of Congress to a certain act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida," in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

AMERICAN HEMP.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of the Navy, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 22d January last, on the subject of the use of American hemp for cordage, in the naval service. The report was read, and ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 13, 1824.

SIR: In answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 22d of January last, "that the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to the Senate, so far as can be ascertained from the accounts in the Navy Department, the quantity of cordage manufactured from hemp of domestic growth, which has been used in the service of the Navy, since the year 1812; and the reasons, if any, why cordage manufactured from domestic hemp cannot be used as advantageously and as economically for the Navy of the United States as cordage manufactured from imported hemp," I have the honor to enclose a letter from the Board of Navy Commissioners, dated 27th January, 1824, and one from the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, dated 12th February, 1824; and am,

Very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,
SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD.

Hon. PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE,
January 27, 1824.

SIR: Upon the subject of the resolution of the honorable the Senate of the United States of the 22d instant, calling for information as to the "quantity of cordage manufactured from hemp of American growth, which has been used in the service of the Navy since the year 1812, and the reasons, if any, why cordage manufactured from American hemp cannot be used as advantageously and as economically for the Navy of the United States as cordage manufactured from imported hemp," the Commissioners of the Navy have the honor to state:

That they have no knowledge of any cordage, manufactured from hemp of American growth, having been used in the Navy since the establishment of the board; that, in the contracts made by them for cordage, they have uniformly introduced a stipulation, binding the contractors to manufacture the cordage of the best Russian hemp.

The reasons which entitle Russian hemp to a preference are to be found solely, it is believed, in the manner of preparing it for market. In its natural state American hemp is, unquestionably, as good as that of any other country; and numerous experiments prove the fact, that, when prepared as Russian hemp is, it is fully equal to the best Russian hemp, and indeed superior to that generally imported. The Russian method is called "water rotting;" that practised in the United States "dew rotting."

Hemp prepared by dew rotting has a dark color, and frequently appears as if it were mildewed. But, from whatever cause, or combination of causes, it may proceed, universal experience has proved that cordage made of dew-rotted hemp is far less durable than that made of water-rotted hemp, particularly when used for cables; although, when perfectly new, it may be nearly as strong, and is sometimes found to be equally so. Hence, cordage manufactured from American hemp cannot, in the opinion of the commissioners, be used as advantageously and as economically for the Navy of the United States as cordage manufactured from imported hemp.

With a climate and great extent of soil, admirably adapted to the culture of hemp, it appears to be a subject of regret that our countrymen have not fallen upon some plan of preparing their hemp for use, so as to give it all the advantages it naturally possesses. The commissioners have ever been desirous of introducing into our Navy cordage made of hemp of our own growth; but when they reflect that the safety of our ships, and the lives of those on board of them, depend so much upon the quality of the cordage used, they cannot take upon themselves the responsibility of using that which their own and universal experience have pronounced to be of inferior quality.

The commissioners have heretofore offered every encouragement in their power, consistently with a due regard to economy, to the growers of American hemp, to induce them to adopt the Russian or some other equally good method of preparing their hemp. Could this be effected, the duty of the commissioners would then, in their view of the subject, permit them to indulge the disposition, which they will never cease to cherish, to use for the navy cordage manufactured of American hemp, to the entire exclusion of hemp the product of any other country.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN RODGERS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Fourth Auditor's Office, Feb. 13, 1824.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 31st ult., enclosing a copy of the resolution of the Senate of the United States, requiring information relative to the quantity of cordage manufactured from hemp of domestic growth, since the year 1812, I have the honor to state that the information cannot be accurately ascertained from the settlements made in this office. It appears, however, that about one hundred and eighty-two tons of Kentucky yarns, and cordage manufactured from Kentucky hempen yarns, have been contracted for and delivered in 1813 and 1814, viz:

One hundred tons cordage, contracted for by Matthew L. Davis, to be manufactured from Kentucky hempen yarns, and delivered at New York in 1813.

Fifty tons Kentucky yarns, contracted for by Richard Pindell and H. Clay, delivered at Baltimore in 1814.

Thirty-one tons 17 cwt. 2 qrs. 27 lbs. Kentucky yarns, contracted for and delivered at New Orleans in 1813, by W. Garret.

I have the honor to be, &c.

eration. These petitioners, as Directors of the New England Mississippi Land Company, claim indemnity for a tract of land belonging to them; which indemnity, to the amount of about $130,000, was awarded to another company, by an error of the commissioners appointed under the act of 3d March, 1814, to adjust and determine upon the Georgia land claims, (commonly called the Yazoo claims,) a considerable part of this money having since come into the hands of the United States, to whom a proportion of the claim of the latter company belonged.

This error, on the part of the commissioners, is now an acknowledged one; they having decided that, as the endorsed notes of hand, which were given in payment for said tract of land, had not been paid, the holders of these notes retained a lien upon the land as security. The petitioners also claim that, if it should not appear proper to the Government to give them the indemnity which they lost by an error on the part of the commissioners, their releases may be given up, and they be reinstated in the title which they held previous to the appointment of the commissioners; as the act of Congress expressly provides that the release, which the petitioners gave to the Government, was not to take effect until indemnity was made.

Mr. MILLS moved to reverse the report of the committee. He spoke, at considerable length, in support of the justice and equity of this claim.

Mr. VAN BUREN, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, supported the report. He did not consider that the Government was bound, in justice or equity, to allow the claim now under consideration. He believed it would be highly inexpedient and impolitic to allow it; and went into a history of the origin of the claim, to support his opinion. As the commissioners were appointed to decide finally upon all the conflicting claims of this kind, according to the best of the light and knowledge which they possessed; and as this was an error in judgment upon law merely, he thought their proceedings could not be opened by Congress for the correction of errors. He resisted the claim of the petitioners to be reinstated in their former title to the land, on the ground that the very spirit of the law for the appointment of the commissioners forbade it, as the grand object for which that law was passed, was, to quiet all these conflicting claims, and relieve the Government from them.

Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, and KELLY, advocated the report of the committee; and, without deciding upon the question, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 24.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with statements from the incorporated banks in the District of Columbia, showing the state of their affairs on the 31st of December last.

Mr. HAYNE presented the petition of Peter Trezevant, formerly a pursuer in the Navy of the United States, praying an equitable settlement of his accounts; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, presented the petition of Benjamin M. Belt, praying payment of his account, for materials and labor, in fitting up apartments in the City Hall, for the accommodation of the circuit court of the District of Columbia; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson courthouse land districts, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, moved that the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Cornelius Hewson. This petitioner prays the allowance of a pension, in consequence of wounds received by a fall on the ice, while engaged in the transportation of forage for the United States troops; by which, as he states, he has been disabled from laboring for his support. The committee was accordingly discharged.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Marie Louise de la Gautrais, widow of François Gonsoulin, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs of Harpin de la Gautrais; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

The two bills from the House of Representatives, brought up yesterday for concurrence, were severally read.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1824," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill for the relief of Napier, Rapelye and Bennett, and Petray and Viel, was read the second time.

The resolution proposing an additional rule, for conducting business in the Senate, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the petition of Ebenezer Oliver, and others, together with the proposed amendment; and, on motion by Mr. TALBOT, the consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Thursday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, requesting information relative to contracts for surveying certain public lands, which was requested by a resolution of the Senate of the 25th of February, 1823, and agreed thereto; and the Secretary was directed to lay the same before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill allowing a drawback on the exportation of cordage, manufactured in the United States from foreign hemp; and, on motion by Mr. D'WOLF, it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Tuesday, the 9th of March next.

On motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill authorizing letters patent to be issued to Samuel Brown. This bill came from the other House, and was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, without amendment. It authorizes a patent to be issued to Samuel Brown, for a certain valuable invention, in which several Americans are interested with him, but which cannot be patented, except by a special act, in consequence of the inventor not having resided in this country the requisite number of years. Mr. VAN BUREN stated the grounds upon which the bill was founded. It was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill in further addition to "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization;" and it was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the choice of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and the election of the President and Vice President of the United States; together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to repeal, in part, an act, entitled 'An act to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned,'" together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on the Judiciary; the amendments were agreed to, and the bill reported to the House amended accordingly; and, the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the holders of French, British, and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the State of Louisiana situate to the east of the Mississippi river and Island of New Orleans, which have not been recognised as valid by the Government of the United States, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof; and, on motion, it was postponed until tomorrow.

CLAIM OF MASSACHUSETTS.

The following Message was yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to Congress certain documents relating to a claim of Massachusetts for services rendered by the militia of that State in the late war, and for which payment was made by the State. From the particular circumstances attending this claim, I have thought it proper to submit the subject to the consideration of Congress.

In forming a just estimate of this claim, it will be necessary to recur to the cause which prevented its admission, or the admission of any part thereof, at an earlier day. It will be recollected, that, when a call was made on the militia of that State for service, in the late war, under an arrangement which was alike applicable to the militia of all the States, and in conformity with the acts of Congress, the Executive of Massachusetts refused to comply with the call, on the principle that the power vested in Congress by the Constitution, to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, was not a complete power for those purposes, but conditional, and dependent on the consent of the Executives of the several States and, also, that, when called into service, such consent being given, they could not be commanded by a regular officer of the United States, or other officer than of the militia, except by the President, in person. That this decision of the Executive of Massachusetts was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and of dangerous tendency, especially when it is considered that we were then engaged in a war with a powerful nation, for the defence of our common rights, was the decided opinion of this Government; and when the period, at which that decision was formed, was considered, it being as early as the 5th of August, 1812, immediately after the war was declared, and that it was not relinquished during the war, it was inferred, by the Executive of the United States, that the decision of the Executive of that State was alike applicable to all the services that were rendered by the militia of the State during the war.

In the correspondence with the Governor of Massachusetts, at that important epoch, and on that very interesting subject, it was announced to him, by the Secretary of War, that, if the militia of the State were called into service by the Executive of the State, and not put under the command of the Major General of the United States, as the militia of the other States were, the expense attending their service would be chargeable to the State, and not to the United States. It was also stated to him, at the same time, that any claim which the State might have for the reimbursement of such expenses, could not be allowed by the Executive of the United States, since it would involve principles on which that branch of the Government could not decide.

Under these circumstances, a decision on the claim of the State of Massachusetts has hitherto been suspended, and it need not be remarked that the suspension has proceeded from a conviction that it would be improper to give any sanction by its admission, or by the admission of any part thereof, either to the construction of the Constitution contended for by the then Executive of that State, or to its conduct, at that period, towards the General Government and the Union.

In January, 1823, the Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts and Maine, suggested, by memorial, that the Constitutional objection could not apply to a portion of the claim, and requested that the accounting officer of the Government might be instructed to audit and admit such part as might be free from that objection. In all cases where claims are presented for militia service, it is the duty and the practice of the accounting officer to submit them to the department for instruction as to the legality of the claim; that is, whether the service had been rendered by order of the competent authority, or otherwise, under circumstances to justify the claim against the United States, admitting that the evidence in support of it should be satisfactory. To this request there appeared to be no well-founded objection, under the reservation, as to the Constitutional principle, and accordingly an order was given to the accounting officers of the Treasury to proceed in auditing the claim, with that reservation.

In conformity with this arrangement, the Executive of Massachusetts appointed two citizens of that State, commissioners to attend to the settlement of its claim, and who, in execution of the trust reposed in them, have presented to the accounting officer of the Treasury that portion, comprehending the services of the fifth division of the militia of the State, which has been audited and reported for consideration, subject to the objection above stated. I have examined this report, with the documents presented by the commissioners, and am of opinion that the services rendered by that division were spontaneous, patriotic, and proper, necessary for self-defence, to repel, in some instances, actual invasion, and in others, by adequate preparation, invasions that were menaced. The commissioners of the State having intimated that other portions of service stood on similar ground, the accounting officer has been instructed, in auditing the whole, to do it in such manner as to enable the Department to show distinctly under what circumstances each portion of service was rendered—whether voluntary, called out by invasion, or the menace of invasion, or by public authority; and in such case, whether the militia rendering such service was placed under the authority of the United States, or retained under that of the State.

It affords me great pleasure to state, that the Executive of Massachusetts has disclaimed the principle which was maintained by the former Executive, and that, in this disclaimer, both branches of the Legislature have concurred. By this renunciation, the State is placed on the same ground, in this respect, with the other States, and this very distressing anomaly in our system is removed. It is well known that the great body of our fellow-citizens in Massachusetts are as firmly devoted to our Union, and to the free republican principles of our Government, as our fellow-citizens of the other States. Of this important truth, their conduct in every stage of our Revolutionary struggle, and in many other emergencies, bears ample testimony; and, I add, with profound interest and a thorough conviction, that, although the difficulty adverted to, in the late war, with their Executive, excited equal surprise and regret, it was not believed to extend to them. There never was a moment when the confidence of the Government in the great body of our fellow-citizens of that State, was impaired; nor is a doubt entertained that they were at all times willing and ready to support their rights, and to repel an invasion by the enemy.

The commissioners of Massachusetts have urged, in compliance with their instructions, the payment of, so much of their claim as applies to the services rendered by the fifth division, which have been audited, and I should have no hesitation in admitting it, if I did not think, under all the circumstances of the case, that the claim, in all its parts, was cognizable by Congress alone. The period at which the Constitutional difficulty was raised, by the Executive of the State, was in the highest degree important, as was the tendency of the principle for which it contended, and which was adhered to during the war. The public mind throughout the Union was much excited by that occurrence, and great solicitude was felt as to its consequences. The Executive of the United States was bound to maintain, and did maintain, a just construction of the Constitution; in doing which, it is gratifying to recollect that the most friendly feelings were cherished towards their brethren of that State. The Executive of the State was warned, in the correspondence which then took place, of the light in which its conduct was viewed, and of the effect it would have, so far as related to the right of the Executive of the United States, on any claim which might afterwards be presented by the State to compensation for such services. Under these circumstances, the power of the Executive of the United States to settle any portion of this claim, seems to be precluded. It seems proper, also, that this claim should be decided, on full investigation, before the public, that the principle on which it is decided may be thoroughly understood by our fellow-citizens of every State, which can be done by Congress alone; who alone, also, possess the power to pass the laws which may be necessary to carry such decision into effect.

In submitting this subject to the calm and enlightened judgment of Congress, I do it with peculiar satisfaction, from a knowledge that you are now placed, by the course of events, in a situation which will enable you to adopt such measures, as will, not only comport with the sound principles of our Government, but, likewise, be conducive to other the highest interests of our Union. By the renunciation of the principle maintained by the then Executive of Massachusetts, as has been done by its present Executive and both branches of the Legislature, in the most formal manner, and in accord with the sentiments of the great body of the people, the Constitution is restored, in a very important feature—that connected with the public defence; and in the most important branch, that of the militia, to its native strength. It is gratifying to know, that this renunciation has been produced by the regular, orderly, and pacific operation of our Republican system, whereby those who were in the right at the moment of difficulty, and who sustained the Government with great firmness, have gained daily strength until this result was accomplished. The points on which you will have to decide, are, what is fairly due for the services which were actually rendered? By what means shall we contribute most to cement the Union, and give the greatest support to our most excellent Constitution? In seeking each object separately we are led to the same result. All that can be claimed by our fellow-citizens of Massachusetts is, that the Constitutional objection be waived, and that they be placed on the same footing with their brethren in the other States—that, regarding the services rendered by the militia of other States, for which compensation has been made, giving to the rule the most liberal construction, like compensation be made for similar services rendered by the militia of that State.

I have been led to conclude, on great consideration, that the principles of justice, as well as a due regard for the great interests of our Union, require that this claim, in the extent proposed, should be acceded to. Essential service was rendered, in the late war, by the militia of Massachusetts, and with the most patriotic motives. It seems just, therefore, that they should be compensated for such services, in like manner with the militia of the other States. The Constitutional difficulty did not originate with them, and has now been removed. It comports with our system to look to the service rendered, and to the intention with which it was rendered, and to award the compensation accordingly, especially as it may now be done without the sacrifice of principle. The motive, in this instance, is the stronger, because well satisfied I am, that, by so doing, we shall give the most effectual support to our republican institutions. No latent cause of discontent will be left behind. The great body of the people will be gratified; and even those who now survive, who were then in error, cannot fail to see, with interest and satisfaction, this distressing occurrence thus happily terminated. I therefore consider it my duty to recommend it to Congress to make provision for the settlement of the claim of Massachusetts, for services rendered in the late war by the militia of the State, in conformity with the rules which have governed in the settlement of the claims for services rendered by the militia of the other States.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23, 1824.

The Message was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplementary to "An act to perfect certain locations and sales of public lands in Missouri," passed April 26, 1822; and, no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House; and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt.

After some remarks on the subject, from Messrs. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, BARBOUR, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the further consideration of it was postponed till to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 25.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the security of public money in the hands of clerks of courts, attorneys, and marshals, and their deputies, reported it, with an amendment.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the consideration of the petition of George Greer.

Mr. MILLS presented the memorial of William and Nathaniel Hooper, merchants, of Marblehead, praying indemnification for spoiliations committed on their commerce, by the public and private armed vessels of France, between the years 1793 and 1800. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill, entitled "An act to repeal, in part, an act, entitled 'An act to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned,'" was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Samuel Brown," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill supplementary to "An act to perfect certain locations and sales of the public lands in Missouri," passed April 26, 1822, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act giving the consent and sanction of Congress to a certain act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Don Harpin de la Gautrais was read the second time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court at Mobile, in the district of Alabama," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. McILVAINE, from the Committee on Claims, submitted a report, upon the petition of Captain Thomas Staniford, late Paymaster in the United States Army, who prays to be relieved from a judgment given against him, in favor of the United States, in consequence of the loss of his documents by fire. The committee report a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

FRANCIS HENDERSON, JUN.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR the Senate, in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, for the relief of Francis Henderson, jun. It will be recollected that this bill grants a certain sum of money to Mr. Henderson, who is the grandson of the late Colonel John Laurens, for diplomatic and military services rendered to the country by his grandfather. Mr. B. moved to amend the bill, by inserting a proviso, requiring, previous to the payment of the money, a full relinquishment of all claims for these services on the part of Francis and Frances E. Henderson, the father and mother of the person for whose relief the bill is drawn. Upon the question to amend, the merits of the bill itself were fully discussed.

Mr. LANMAN called for the reading of certain documents, showing the compensation which had already been made to Colonel Laurens, and his family. Messrs. BARBOUR, MILLS, and MACON, advocated the bill, and Messrs. CHANDLER, TAYLOR, of Virginia, HOLMES, of Maine, LANMAN, SMITH, BELL, and KELLY, opposed it.

The bill was supported on the grounds that the claim was one of strict justice—that the money was actually due for military services rendered by Colonel Laurens, and for outfits, which ought to have been allowed him in his diplomatic character, when appointed a special Minister to France; and that the objection made to paying the money to the grandson, instead of the daughter of Colonel Laurens, would be obviated by the adoption of the amendment, requiring the sanction of Mr. and Mrs. Henderson previous to the payment of the money.

It was objected against the passage of the bill, that Colonel Laurens, although he had rendered high and valuable services to the country, had received all the compensation that he had wished or expected for those services; that the length of time which had elapsed ought to be considered as a bar to all such claims; and that, if the claim were allowed at all, the money should be paid to the daughter, and not to the grandson of Colonel Laurens.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BARBOUR was carried. He then moved to fill the blank in the bill for the amount to be granted with "$7,542 41." This motion was rejected—14 yeas, 23 nays. Considering this last vote as decisive of the fate of the bill, Mr. BARBOUR moved its indefinite postponement, which was carried without opposition.

THURSDAY, February 26.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Moses Atkinson, and others, made an unfavorable report thereon.

Mr. MILLS presented the petition of Peter Charles L'Enfant, praying compensation for his services in surveying and locating the City of Washington, and for making a map thereof. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MILLS presented the petition of Martin Lincoln and Ann F. Humphreys, presenting an equitable settlement of the accounts of the late Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, and Gen. David Humphreys, for services rendered as commissioners in negotiating a treaty with the Creek Indians, in the year 1789. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, gave notice that he would, on Monday next, ask leave to bring in a bill for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States.

On motion by Mr. TALBOT, the Senate resumed the motion of the 13th inst., to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of making certain modifications of the Judiciary act of 1789; and agreed thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives, to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court at Mobile, in the district of Alabama," and concurred therein.

The bill for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford was read the second time.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of State, with the names, number, and salaries, of the clerks employed in his office during the year 1823.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented the petition of Thomas Johnston, late purser of the United States ship Constitution, in behalf of himself, and the officers and crew of said ship, praying that the proceeds of certain vessels, captured by that ship in the year 1805, may be paid to the captors. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The following Message was read, received yesterday, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War, which communicates all the information in possession of the Department, which was called for by a resolution of the Senate of the 21st of January, 1824.

JAMES MONROE.

FEBRUARY 24, 1824.

EBENEZER OLIVER, AND OTHERS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, adverse to the petition of Ebenezer Oliver, and others, of Boston, Directors of the New England Mississippi Land Company. A long discussion ensued upon the merits of the claim. The question was upon the motion made, at that time, by Mr. MILLS, to reverse the report of the committee. This motion was supported by Messrs. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, LANMAN, SEYMOUR, TALBOT, and MILLS, and opposed by Messrs. VAN BUREN, KELLY, and HOLMES, of Maine. The question was then taken, and the Senate refused to reverse the report, by a vote of 22 to 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Hayne, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of N. York, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, McIlvaine, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Seymour, Talbot, and Van Dyke.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Branch, Brown, Chandler, Dickerson, Edwards of Connecticut, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lowrie, Macon, Ruggles, Smith, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, Van Buren, and Ward.

Whereupon, in concurrence with said report, it was resolved that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

FRIDAY, February 27.

On motion, by Mr. MILLS, the Committee on the District of Columbia were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Peter Charles L'Enfant, and it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the passing of the bill, now before Congress, to impose additional duties on imports.

He also presented the memorial of Philip Tutchett and others, of G. Persjco and others, of William Mayall and others, of Enos Ellis and others, of Andrew Young and others, and of George Myers and others, all of the city and county of Philadelphia, severally praying that the duties on imports may be increased.

He also presented the memorial of Henry Moore and others, of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, praying the imposition of additional duties on imported iron, and on the manufactures thereof. The said memorials were read, and severally referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. SEYMOUR presented the memorial of D.

Henshaw, praying indemnification for depredations committed on his property by the public and private armed vessels of France, between the years 1793 and 1800. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of William Eaton; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer; and it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, together with the amendment proposed by Mr. VAN BUREN; and, on motion, by Mr. MILLS, it was postponed to Monday next.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, unfavorable to the petition of Moses Atkinson, and others, was read for consideration. These petitioners pray that they be indemnified for losses sustained by the destruction of the ship Adams, destroyed at Castine, during the late war, at the time that place was invested by the enemy. The report was agreed to.

The bill providing for the more effectual defence of the country, by the organization of the militia, was taken up, and postponed to, and made the order of the day for, a week from next Monday.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill to enable the holders of French, British, and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the State of Louisiana situate to the east of the Mississippi river and island of New Orleans, which have not been recognised as valid by the Government of the United States, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof.

Mr. VAN BUREN moved an amendment to confine the operation of the law to such claims as have been reported to the Government and laid before Congress, which was agreed to. He also proposed a new section to the bill, requiring that, in all claims amounting to one thousand acres, that the Attorney General of the United States shall be furnished with copies of the proceedings on such claims, in the District Court in which they are to be decided, in order that an appeal may be made, if thought proper, when the decisions are against the United States, to the Supreme Court.

This amendment was objected to by Messrs. LOWRIE and LANMAN, and supported by the mover, and Messrs. CHANDLER and HOLMES. Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, explained the provisions of the bill. He stated that there would be about three hundred and sixty claims to be decided under this act, involving about a million of acres of land. The new section, proposed by Mr. VAN BUREN, was agreed to. The bill was then reported to the Senate, as amended; and, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was postponed to Monday next, and made the order of that day.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill from the House of Representatives, making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1824, without amendment. On motion of Mr. SMITH, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, Mr. BRANCH in the chair, proceeded to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SMITH said it would be perceived that this bill provided for but part of the military expenditures for the year, and for that part which it was highly important should be acted upon immediately. As the bill had been fully investigated by committees of both Houses, he presumed that no further explanation, on his part, was necessary.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out that part of the bill which provides an appropriation for the purchase of a farm in the vicinity of the Military Academy, at West Point, at a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars; upon which farm there is a public house.

Mr. CHANDLER was in favor of striking out the clause alluded to. He thought it would be of no great use to purchase this farm, with the public house upon it, when another tavern could be erected immediately at some other place.

Mr. LOWRIE said he had hitherto entertained the opinion that the discipline at the Military Academy was such as not to require any appropriation like this: but, since he had examined into the statement of its situation, in relation to this tavern, he had no doubt of the propriety of purchasing the farm. It had been stated that, in consequence of the location of this public house in the vicinity of the institution, the students obtained liquor, which was introduced into the barracks, against the rules of the Academy. He considered the only question to be, whether a great nuisance should be removed, at the expense of ten thousand dollars. The Senate would recollect that great sums of money had been expended upon this seminary; and if, by the appropriation of ten thousand dollars, a great evil could be removed from it, he thought it important that it should be done. The object was incalculably greater than the expenditure proposed. He had much rather that the police of the institution should have been such as to restrain all improprieties of this kind: but perhaps it was not possible to restrain them. He understood the regulations were as good as they could be. He called for the reading of a letter, upon this subject, from the Superintendent of the Academy.

Mr. MACON believed that there was not a school, an academy, or an institution for the instruction of youth, in the United States, where similar evils were not to be found. These public houses, he said, were scattered about the country in every direction; and the expense would be immense if the Government was to purchase them all, to prevent their injurious effects upon our youth. He thought there was another objection to this purchase—the Government could not exercise authority over the land without the consent of the State of New York. West Point had been ceded to the Government by the State; and, therefore, jurisdiction could be exercised over it. But, if this farm was bought, the land attached to that institution, will be held by two different tenures. If any profit is to be made by a public house there, another will soon be built—and the Government must buy all the land to prevent it. If the young students are determined to have a frolic, they will have it, at all events.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, had strong doubts of this appropriation. We are about to vote ten thousand dollars for the purchase of this farm. The owner will know very well what amount is appropriated, and he will not take less than the whole amount. It is a monstrous price for the land. Mr. H. believed it very necessary that there should be a public house somewhere in the vicinity of the Academy, for the accommodation of the friends of the students, and others who might visit it, and he believed there would be one. It is said that the place is so surrounded by mountains, that there is no spot on which to erect another house. But there is certainly a road over the mountains leading to the place; and enterprising individuals will be found, who will erect another house on or near that road. If the mountains are as high as Atlas itself, they will have a tavern—they will build a house upon the mountain, and make steps to it, if there is no other place. Are not these irregularities among the students the fault of the discipline of the institution? When the students wish to violate the rules, would they not rather have the public house further off? If the house were at a distance, so as to be without the view of the officers of the Academy, would not the excesses be greater? If we purchase this farm, another house will be immediately erected upon the borders of it, and the excesses will be greater there than they are at the present place. If the purchase is made at all, it must be by cession of the jurisdiction from the State. But, Mr. H. did not believe there was any necessity for the purchase.

Mr. LOWRIE said he had no doubt that a tavern was necessary in the vicinity of the Academy; and there certainly might be one there; but he thought it ought to be under the regulation of the Government of the institution. As to the question of jurisdiction, the United States undoubtedly have a right to purchase the same title which the present owner possesses; and this is all the jurisdiction that is wanted. He believed the object to be much greater than the price to be paid; and it was somewhat doubtful whether the farm could be purchased for the sum proposed.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, hoped the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina would prevail. This appropriation would introduce a new principle into our Government—a principle that we shall purchase out every nuisance that exists in the neighborhood of our public seminaries. We confess that we are so deficient in discipline that we cannot prevent these bad effects, except by purchase. We have such nuisances near to every camp, arsenal, and public institution of every kind in the country. If a tavern becomes a great nuisance, instead of suppressing its abuses by the civil authority, we are to put it down by purchasing it. It is establishing a dangerous precedent. But, Mr. L. asked, with all respect for this Academy, and the men connected with it, why Congress was called upon to guard the morals of those youths only who are to be educated for the military service? Almost every other institution in the country is subject to the same inconveniences. It is our duty to guard their morals as well as those of the Military Academy. And are we certain, if the appropriation is made, and the farm purchased, that we shall get rid of the evil? No man can believe that, if the discipline of the institution is so lax as to suffer these excesses, and the young men are disposed to engage in them, that two or three miles will make any difference? If there is a tavern anywhere near the place, they will find the way to it. It seems that this violation of the rules of the Seminary takes place after 12 o'clock, at which time the guard is removed. Let the guard be posted till daylight, then. Is it not better to pursue that course than to establish the new system of jurisprudence proposed in this bill? Mr. L. thought the measure would not produce the good effects which were expected from it. If the Attorney General is correct in his opinion, the students of this Academy are subject to martial law. The same restraints must be imposed upon them as upon soldiers of the line. The officers have only to make their rules more strict. They must post their guards till sunrise, if necessary. Mr. L. said he doubted the constitutionality of the measure now proposed. He believed the United States could exercise no jurisdiction over the farm in question without the consent of the State. The jurisdiction cannot be acquired, except for the purposes which are specifically provided in the Constitution. [Mr. L. read the provision of the Constitution on this subject.] Under that clause, he did not believe that a purchase could be made for this object; and he thought it would introduce a bad principle into the Government.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that his honorable colleague, who was a member of the committee that reported this bill, and who had paid considerable attention to this subject, was not now in his seat. He therefore moved that the bill be postponed till Monday next, and made the order of that day. This motion was agreed to.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

The bill authorizing the register of the land office for the western district of the State of Louisiana to report upon certain land claims within the said district, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, explained the object of the bill. He said it merely authorized the register to report upon certain claims which were not reported upon by his predecessor, in consequence of his appointment to another office. Without taking any question on the bill, the Senate adjourned.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 1.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, the Committee on Finance were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Peter Trezevant; and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. NOBLE communicated the preamble and resolutions of the General Assembly of Indiana, approving the sentiments expressed in the Message of the President of the United States at the opening of the present Congress, as respects our foreign and domestic policy; expressing their warmest sympathy and admiration for the inhabitants of Greece, in resisting the oppressions of the Government of Turkey; and declaring their approbation of any countenance and encouragement that may be extended to them by this Government, consistent with the principles of neutrality; which were read, and laid on file.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of the Vestry of Christ's church parish, in the city of Washington, praying the aid of Congress in erecting a durable wall around their burial ground, as well for the purpose of protecting it from improper intrusion, as to preserve the monuments erected therein at the expense of the Government from wanton injury; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VAN BUREN presented the petition of James Thomas, late Quartermaster General in the Army, praying that a judgment obtained by the United States against him in the Supreme Court of the Territory of Michigan, in September, 1818, may be opened, and a new trial granted, so that he may be let in to a just and equitable defence; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LOWRIE stated, that he had some doubts as to the propriety of the vote passed by the Senate, some days since, by which the report of the Judiciary Committee, unfavorable to the petition of Ebenezer Oliver and others, was accepted. He would, therefore, move the re-consideration of that vote, and wished the motion might be permitted to lie upon the table, with a view to call it up hereafter, in case a further discussion of the merits of the claim should be thought proper. He then moved the reconsideration of that vote; and the motion was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the President and Directors of the Columbia Turnpike Road Company, reported a bill supplementary to "An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the settlement of pecuniary claims; which was read twice, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

sentatives from the State of Virginia, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, M.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer; and it was postponed until to-morrow.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, it was Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. WILLIAM LEE BALL, late a member of the House of Representatives, from the State of Virginia, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go in mourning, and wear crape round the left arm, for thirty days.

The Senate then adjourned to Wednesday.

WEDNESDAY, March 3.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of War, exhibiting the amount of the expense on account of the Military Academy at West Point, for one year preceding the 30th of September last, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, of the first of March last.

Mr. ELLIOTT presented the memorial of George Jones, and others, citizens of the city of Savannah, and county of Chatham, in Georgia, praying that no increase of the duties on imports may be made; with their reasons at large against the bill now before Congress on that subject. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. HAYNE presented the memorial of David R. Williams, and others, in behalf of the citizens of Darlington, in South Carolina, praying that no act may pass Congress whereby the existing rate of duties on imports may be increased; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. MILLS presented the petition of Holder Slocum, of Dartmouth, Massachusetts, praying the interposition of the Government, to enable him to obtain indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of the unjust detention of his vessel, at Hamburg, by the French Government, in the year 1807; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KING, of New York, presented the memorial of John Vanderlyn, suggesting the propriety of the execution of a painting representing the battle on the plains of New Orleans, and requesting to be employed for that purpose; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PARROTT presented the petition of Jonathan Folsom, and Thomas Haven, of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, praying that their account, for erecting a ship-house, slip, and launch-ways, at the navy yard, at Portsmouth, may be settled upon equitable principles; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LANMAN presented the petition of Nathaniel Canada, of New London, Connecticut, praying indemnification for the loss of the bridge at Rope Ferry, which he states was burnt by the British forces in 1814, in consequence of the toll-house, attached thereto, being occupied by the American troops. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. VAN BUREN presented the memorial of the United Society, called Shakers, of New York, praying to be exempted from the performance of militia duty, being conscientiously opposed to bearing arms; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. WARE presented the memorial of the inhabitants of the city of Darien, and McIntosh county, in Georgia, representing the bill now before Congress, to increase the duties on imports, as unequal in its operation, and unconstitutional, and remonstrating against its becoming a law; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BRANCH presented the memorial of the General Assembly of North Carolina, representing that that State ceded to the United States that portion of their territory which now forms the State of Tennessee, reserving the right to perfect titles to land therein, either for military services, or upon entries which had been made agreeably to law, and the titles thereon not perfected by grant; that, by a subsequent compact with Tennessee, those rights were transferred to that State, upon certain conditions, one of which is, that North Carolina shall have the exclusive right of issuing military land warrants; that no time is prescribed, either in the act of cession, or in the compact with Tennessee, within which the claimants shall assert their rights; that, by an act of Tennessee, a period was fixed when those claims should be exhibited, which has expired; and that a number of those claims remain unsatisfied, and for the satisfaction of which the faith of North Carolina stands pledged; and praying that provision may be made by Congress for their liquidation. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of opening a post road from Baton Rouge to the Opelousas Courthouse, in the State of Louisiana.

The bill supplementary to "An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia," was read the second time.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill regulating the transportation of gold and silver bullion, specie, and jewels, and carrying of passengers, and to prohibit the receipt of merchandise, in the public vessels of the United States; and, on motion, it was postponed till to-morrow.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the Senate (as in Committee of the Whole) resumed the consideration of the bill from the other House, making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1824. The question was stated from the Chair, to be upon the motion made by Mr. MACON, when the bill was before under consideration, to strike out the clause providing for the purchase of a farm, upon which is a tavern, in the vicinity of the Military Academy, at West Point.

This motion was supported by Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, CHANDLER, MACON, LLOYD, of Maryland, BRANCH, TAYLOR, of Virginia, and LANMAN, on the ground that the purchase of the farm in question would not remove the nuisance, in consequence of the existence of which, the purchase is proposed; as a tavern might be built on some place a little further removed from the Academy; and the incapacity of the United States to make the purchase, and hold the title, was urged as an objection. The motion to strike out this appropriation was opposed by Messrs. KING, of New York, VAN BUREN, SMITH, HAYNE, and MILLS, who contended that the removal of the tavern from this farm, or its regulation by the officers of the Academy, would eminently promote the interest of the institution, and preserve the morals of the students. The power of the Government to purchase and hold the land was also supported. The question was then taken, by yeas and nays, and decided against striking out this appropriation, 16 in the affirmative, and 26 in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Macon, Palmer, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, and Ware—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards of Connecticut, Elliott, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Louisiana, Kelly, King of New York, Knight, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Mills, Noble, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Williams—26.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

THURSDAY, March 4.

On motion, by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Jesse Camp.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented sundry documents in support of the claim of François Navarre, for property lost during the late war; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HAYNE presented the petition of the legal representatives of James Roddey, late of Charleston, South Carolina, deceased, stating that the deceased was a contractor for the Army during the late war, and that a large balance is due from the United States to his estate on that account; which balance has been improperly transferred on the books of the Treasury to the credit of one Robert C. Jennings, which illegal proceeding they pray may be investigated and corrected. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer.

SENATE.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying the extinction of the Indian title to certain lands within that State; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill in addition to an act entitled "An act to amend the ordinance and acts of Congress for the government of the Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

Mr. V. B., from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States, reported it without amendments.

Mr. V. B., from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred by resolution of the Senate of the 17th December last, reported a bill in addition to the act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, which was twice read, by unanimous consent.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies of the several instructions to the Ministers of the United States to the Government of France, and of the correspondence between the said Ministers and Government, having reference to the spoliations committed by that Power on the commerce of the United States anterior to the 30th of September, 1800; or so much thereof as can be communicated without prejudice to the public interests; also, how far, if at all, the claim of indemnity from the Government of France, for the spoliations aforesaid, was affected by the Convention entered into between the United States and France on the said 30th of September, 1800.

Mr. WARE presented the preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Augusta, against any increase of duties on imports; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1824," was read the third time, and passed.

SARAH EASTON AND DOROTHY STORER.

The report of the Committee on Claims, adverse to the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, was taken up for consideration. These petitioners, daughters of the late Colonel Robert H. Harrison, pray that they may receive the commutation for half pay, and the bounty land, provided by Congress for the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army, to which they think they are entitled in virtue of the services rendered by their father, as Aid-de-Camp and principal Secretary to General Washington, from 1775 to 1781, at which time General H. retired from the Army, on furlough, in consequence of the bad state of his health, which he never afterwards recovered, and died in 1790. The Committee report against the claim, on the grounds that there is not sufficient evidence that General Harrison retired from the Army, on furlough; or that his case could be brought within the acts allowing the commutation and bounty—that his accounts with the Government do not appear to have been regularly settled—that it is not found that he himself ever made any claim for half pay, or bounty land, and that they cannot perceive any good reason why the prayer of the petitioners should be granted.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, opposed the report of the Committee, and moved to reverse it. Messrs. BARBOUR and JOHNSON, of Louisiana, advocated that motion, and Messrs. BELL, CHANDLER, TAYLOR, of Virginia, and RUGGLES, opposed it. Without taking the question, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 5.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, containing copies of the contracts made by the Surveyor General, and called for by a resolution of the Senate, bearing date the 24th February, 1824.

JAMES MONROE.

MARCH 3, 1824.

The Message and report were read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT communicated the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of New York, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their best exertions to procure from the United States indemnification for losses sustained by the conflagration and destruction of the houses and effects of certain persons who resided on and near the Niagara river, during the late war; which were read, and on motion, by Mr. VAN BUREN, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NOBLE presented the petition of Demas Deming, assignee of Hugh Glenn, praying the payment of a balance found to be due from the United States, by the verdict of a jury, to the said Glenn, as contractor for supplying rations to the troops and Indian department, in the State of Indiana, in the course of the late war; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion, by Mr. RUGGLES, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Mary Davis and Thomas W. Davis, representatives of Solomon Davis, deceased.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, of the 3d instant, to instruct the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to inquire into the expediency of opening a post road in Louisiana; and, on motion, by Mr. MILLS, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill, reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, "in addition to the act incorporating the Washington and Alexandria Turnpike Corporation," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. This bill authorizes the corporation to establish additional tolls, &c. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill to "alter the time for holding the District Courts in the District of Kentucky," was taken up in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate then proceeded to the further consideration of the bill "to provide gradual supplies of cannon, bombs, and howitz, for the fortifications of the United States." After some discussion, in which Messrs. LOWRIE, JACKSON, SMITH, and KING, of New York, took part, the bill was postponed till Monday next.

The bill "for the relief of the legal representatives of Alexander Mitchell, deceased," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. This bill provides for the reimbursement of a sum of money paid for a license on a still, under certain circumstances. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, together with the amendment proposed thereto; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

The report of the Committee on Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, was again taken up; but after some further discussion, by Messrs. BELL, BARBOUR, LANMAN, SMITH, and HOLMES, of Maine, it was postponed till Monday next.

The Senate then took up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the Register of the Land Office for the Western district of the State of Louisiana, to report upon certain land claims within the said district. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to enable the holders of French, British, and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the State of Louisiana situate to the east of the Mississippi river and island of New Orleans, which have not been recognised as valid by the Government of the United States, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof, together with the amendments made thereto by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the said amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, was again read. The resolution requests from the President of the United States copies of the instructions given to our Ministers to France, with the correspondence, and such other information in reference to spoliations committed on our commerce by the vessels of that nation previous to the year 1800 as it may be proper to communicate, in order to show how far the individual claims to indemnity for those spoliations was affected by the convention concluded with France in the year 1800.

Mr. BARBOUR stated that, as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the numerous petitions on this subject was referred, he had communicated with the Secretary of State in relation to it. He had been informed that the documents connected with these claims were so voluminous that they could not possibly be prepared during the present session. He did not make this remark in opposition to the resolution, but merely to show to the Senate the reason why the Committee would not be able to report on these claims.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, made a few remarks in favor of the resolution. He was not sufficiently informed on the subject, although it involved claims of a large amount, for want of the information mentioned in the resolution. And, as those claims could not be acted upon with propriety until this information was obtained, he hoped the resolution would be agreed to, even though it might postpone a decision on the claims until the next session of Congress.

The resolution was then agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF SPECIE, &c., IN PUBLIC VESSELS.

The bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, "regulating the transportation of gold and silver bullion, specie, and jewels, and carrying of passengers, and to prohibit the receipt of merchandise, in the public vessels of the United States," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, said, as he had offered the resolution which gave rise to this bill, he thought it his duty to state the views which induced him to propose it. He felt a great interest in the Navy, and wished to do all he could to sustain its honor. He believed the permission to carry specie had grown up, like many other of our practices, from the example of England. But it became now necessary to inquire how far the honor and welfare of the country and its Navy was compromised by this practice. Considerable sums of money have been made in this traffic by some of our officers; our public vessels have been the depositories and the insurers of the property of foreign nations, and of belligerents. This permission to carry specie was calculated to destroy the fine and chivalrous feelings of the officer—to turn his mind from seeking "reputation at the cannon's mouth," to interested and sordid pursuits. Further than this, the practice was liable to involve us in difficulties with foreign nations. It was an infringement of our neutral character; it was authorizing a practice in regard to those nations which had not the power of resistance, which the more powerful would never submit to. These considerations, affecting the character of the country and the Navy, led him to believe that the transportation of specie in public vessels ought to be prohibited.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, he believed that the transportation of specie in public vessels might be permitted, under certain regulations, without detriment to the service. Great Britain had allowed this practice in her navy, time out of mind, under restrictions. In our Navy there has been no regulation on the subject, and it ought not to be permitted to go on so. Our vessels were liable to engage in improper cruises, and to enter Proceedings.

improper ports, for the purpose of carrying on this trade; and it might jeopardize the peace of the country. The transportation of specie by our public vessels certainly requires some regulation, although Mr. L. thought it was not proper to prohibit it entirely. The bill now before the Senate contains the necessary provisions: it provides what ports specie may be carried to and from, and what countries, under certain circumstances. The permission to bring specie in the national vessels to the United States is important to the country. It is said that we are in great want of specie; the embarrassments of the manufacturers, particularly, are said to be very great*—and how are we to get specie? It must come from foreign countries, and the public vessels furnish the safest mode of transportation. He believed that no dishonorable acts could be charged upon our naval officers in this respect.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, rose to explain. He had not the least intention to charge any of our naval officers with improper conduct, but thought that the transportation of specie ought to be prohibited, to prevent consequences which might hereafter result from the practice.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, he had not understood the gentleman from Maryland as intending to prefer any charges against the officers of the Navy. He believed there was no danger that their honorable character would be affected by continuing this practice. It had not produced that effect upon the officers of the British navy. Hitherto we have had no regard to the maximum of freight to be allowed for the transportation of specie. This bill has a provision on that point. In the present absence of all regulation, the commanders of the vessels have themselves received all the benefit accruing from the freight of the specie. Not so in the British service. A certain part of the freight in their vessels goes to the other officers, and a part to the Greenwich hospital. The present bill has a similar provision. A certain portion of the freight money is to go to the inferior officers and to the Navy Hospital fund. It appears to the committee proper that some regulation should also be adopted in relation to the transportation of passengers. Considerable inconvenience has occurred from carrying passengers. We have been in the habit of making drawing-rooms of the cabins of our public vessels. This is certainly not beneficial to the service. If our captains can carry their ladies and families in their vessels, the lieutenants may do the same; and this will be an increasing evil. The bill proposes checks upon the improprieties that may hereafter occur. Mr. L. thought that it would be better to take up the bill, section after section, in order that it might be fully considered, and opportunity be afforded for amendments, if gentlemen should think proper to propose any.

Mr. SMITH said, that he was not yet sufficiently informed upon this subject, to go into the consideration of it, at the present time. He therefore moved its postponement until Wednesday next. This motion was agreed to.

MONDAY, March 8.

Mr. ELLIOTT presented the memorial of John Wingfield, and others, in behalf of the citizens of Morgan county, in Georgia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill now before Congress, to increase the duties on imports, as unconstitutional, and highly prejudicial to the commercial and agricultural interests of the country; which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Library Committee, to whom was referred the petitions of Way & Gideon, and Edward De Kraft, reported on the subject, authorizing the purchase of ten copies of the Journals of the Old Congress.

Mr. BARTON presented the memorial of the chairman and trustees of the corporation of St. Charles, in Missouri, praying that certain lots and our lots, appertaining to the town, and which the President was authorized to select for military purposes, may be applied to purposes of education; and that the commons of St. Charles may be, also, applied to the same object. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented the petition of Benjamin Bridges, praying to be compensated for military services rendered during the late war; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James Jackson, and J. C. McLamore, sureties of the late Robert Searcy, made a report

 To the Editors of the National Intelligencer.*

GENTLEMEN: In the report in your paper of this morning, of some remarks I had made in the Senate, in reference to the bill for the transportation of specie in the public vessels of the United States, it is stated, that I observed "the embarrassments of the manufacturers particularly, are said to be very great." This is erroneous, and, at the present moment, might give an impression of my sentiments, and perhaps an influence to them, which, at any other time, they would not command. My observation was, that the importation of specie was important to the country, and ought to be encouraged; that, shortly after the late war, the importation of it from Europe was one means of more speedily restoring the circulations of the United States, or part of them, to a sound basis; that, if we believed the statements, letters, and pamphlets, of the manufacturers, with which our tables are covered, much of the bankruptcy and distress they so conspicuously descant upon, arose from the want of it; and that for these and other reasons the public vessels, under suitable regulations, ought not to be restrained from taking it.

In the part of the country with which I am best acquainted, my impression is not, "that the embarrassments of the manufacturers are particularly great;" on the contrary, my belief is, that, in New England at least, they at present, collectively considered, form the most thriving and prosperous part of the community; and, if any evidence of the correctness of this opinion were wanted, it might be derived from the high rate of advance on the cost, which stock, in well established and well conducted manufacturing companies, has long commanded, and still continues to command, a common-sense standard, not liable to much of fallacy among an active, sagacious, and commercial population.

The situation of the respectable reporters in the Senate, while it not only fully accounts for occasional misapprehensions, entitles them to great credit, for the intelligent general view which they give of the debates that occur in it. But, for the reason before mentioned, your insertion of the present explanation in the next paper will oblige

Your obedient servant,

J. LLOYD.

MARCH 6.

[The remark of Mr. Lloyd, in regard to the disadvantageous position of the reporters, is, we regret to say, particularly applicable to their position in relation to himself, to Mr. Jackson, Mr. King of New York, and some other gentlemen on the right of the Chair, whose remarks are consequently not heard at all, or very indistinctly heard by the reporters.]

18th CON. 1st SESS.—11

accompanied by a resolution, that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

The bill to change the terms of the district court of the United States for the Kentucky district, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Andrew Mitchell, deceased, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to amend an act, entitled "An act for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill authorizing the register of the land office for the western district of the State of Louisiana to report upon certain land claims within the said district, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to enable the holders of French, British, and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the State of Louisiana situated to the east of the Mississippi river and island of New Orleans, which have not been recognised as valid by the Government of the United States, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KING, of New York, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill "to authorize the employment of certain assistants in the General Land Office." This bill authorizes the employment of draughtsmen to prepare maps which have been ordered by the Senate. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

PUBLIC LANDS IN INDIANA.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of the General Assembly of Indiana, praying permission to revoke the ordinance exempting from taxation for five years those public lands which have been sold, reported a bill granting the prayer of the petitioners in part. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands have had under their consideration, a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, asking the consent of Congress to the revocation of that part of the compact between the United States and the State of Indiana, by which all public lands sold in that State, after the 1st day of December, 1816, were exempted from taxation by the State, for the term of five years after the sale thereof, and submit the following report—

By the general regulations for the sale of the United States lands, passed on 10th May, 1800, the United States reserved a reversionary interest for the term of five years, in all lands by them sold. At the expiration of that term, if the lands sold were not fully paid for, they might, in the manner described in those regulations, revert absolutely to the United States; although, during that term, the purchaser had an estate in the lands purchased, (subject to the revision,) which might have been taxed by the State in which they lie, if no compact to the contrary had been made.

To guard this reversionary interest from the embarrassments that might have been created by the States exercising the right of taxation, and to prevent the debtors of the United States from being rendered less able to pay for their lands, the United States required, as one of the conditions to the propositions made to the several States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama, in their respective acts authorizing them to form their constitutions, that they should provide by ordinances irrevocable, without the consent of Congress, that all lands sold by the United States, within the limits of those several States, after the times limited in said acts respectively, should be exempt from any taxation under the authority of those particular States, during the said term of five years.

With this condition each of the enumerated States complied.

Afterwards, by an act passed on the 24th of April, 1820, Congress, among other things, abolished the system of credit in the sales of public lands made after the first of July of that year.

Upon this event, the committee is of opinion that every reason which induced that condition ceased; that the lands sold by the United States after the 1st of July, 1820, being absolutely private property, became taxable of right by the States in which they lie; and that a proper case had then occurred, in which to give the consent of Congress to the revocation of so much of those compacts as provide for the exemption in question, as seems, indeed, to have been anticipated and provided for, by the several acts authorizing the formation of those States, and the ordinances passed by their conventions.

That the enhancement of the value of public lands was not the object of Congress, in requiring those exemptions from taxation, is manifest from the fact, that no such exemption has ever been attached to the sale of lands in the several Territories of the United States, neither before nor since the adoption of the enumerated States into the Union. Yet, as the compacts in that respect were not revoked in point of fact, but remained in force to the present time; and, as the exemption from taxation many have entered into the inducement to the purchase of lands heretofore sold under it, the committee deem it inexpedient to propose any change in those compacts that may affect lands heretofore sold by the United States.

But, believing that every reason for such exemptions has ceased with regard to the United States, and that great inequality and injustice are produced in those individual States, by the unequal burdens imposed on that class of their citizens who purchased before the formation of their respective constitutions, and that class who purchased since; and, also, by a great diminution of the revenues of those States after it has ceased to be necessary, or even useful to the United States, the committee submit a bill declaring the consent of Congress, to the revocation of so much of the said ordinances as establishes the exemptions complained of by the State of Indiana on her part, so far as they may affect lands hereafter to be sold by the United States.

The report and bill were read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

PURCHASERS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. NOBLE presented the memorial of the General Assembly of Indiana, suggesting the expediency of authorizing, by law, all those persons who suffered a forfeiture of lands on which payments had been made, and the forfeiture incurred prior to the act for the relief of purchasers of public lands, passed in 1821, to apply the amount paid to the purchase of other lands; and, of reducing the price of certain public lands within that State, of an inferior quality. The memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NOBLE said, in presenting the above memorial, that he was proud to have it in his power to say, that in the memorial, the Legislature had manifested their attachment to the Federal Government, and for the interest and prosperity of it. He said, the Legislature had gone further—that they had, on the part of their constituents, and for themselves, acknowledged the benevolent policy heretofore exercised by Congress towards the purchasers of public lands, by which many of them have been redeemed from ruin, and saved from forfeiture; and without the aid of such policy, their lands must have reverted to the United States.

The Legislature, said Mr. N., presents two subjects for the consideration of Congress, both of which he deemed to be well worthy of consideration. The first was, that of permitting, by law, those individuals who, prior to the act of Congress for the relief of purchasers of public lands, passed in 1821, suffered a forfeiture of lands on which one or more payments had been made, to apply the amount of their forfeitures in the purchase of other lands, confining them to the districts wherein the forfeitures accrued. There can be no objection to this, because the lands have reverted to the United States, and the amount of money paid by the purchaser, which was the forfeiture, is in your Treasury. You are not asked for money, but merely for land, since you have been in the habit of selling in tracts of eighty acres, and the application of the forfeitures to be confined to the same land districts.

The second subject is, the expediency of reducing the price of public lands in those districts where they had been offered for sale, for ten or more years, and have not yet found purchasers. The history of the sales of the public lands in this country, proves, that, to reduce the price of your lands in the old settled parts of the country, is a true policy. We all know, that your good lands are first selected, and the most indifferent tracts are rejected; and, as the districts become closely settled, these refused, indifferent, and broken tracts of land, serve only for those persons adjacent, to trespass upon, cut, and carry away your timber, thereby, in time, rendering the land of little or no value to the Government. The Legislature of Indiana, from the pride of attachment to the General Government, and for their interest, as well as the interest of the State, apprise you of the facts, and disclaim any other motive.

SARAH EASTON AND DOROTHY STORER.

The report of the Committee on Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, was again taken up for consideration. The grounds of this claim were stated particularly when it was before under discussion. The petitioners are daughters of Colonel Robert H. Harrison, Aid-de-camp to General WASHINGTON; and they claim the commutation for half-pay and bounty land, which they state to have been due to their late father. The question before the Senate was, upon the motion of Mr. LLOYD of Maryland, to reverse the report. This motion was advocated, and the claim supported by Messrs. HAYNE, LANMAN, and SMITH, and opposed by Messrs. BELL, CHANDLER, and TAYLOR of Virginia. The question on reversing the report was put, and decided in the negative—14 in favor of, and 25 against it, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Eaton, Hayne, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Mills, Smith, Talbot, Thomas, Van Buren, and Van Dyke.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Branch, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards of Connecticut, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Kelly, King of Alabama, Knight, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, Maccon, Noble, Palmer, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, and Williams.

Whereupon, it was resolved, that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HAYNE moved that the several resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the election of President and Vice President, should be taken up. In calling up these resolutions, he said, that they had been lying so many weeks upon the table, that he felt himself bound to call the attention of the Senate to them, at this time, in order that some decision should take place in relation to them. It will be recollected, said Mr. H., that several propositions to amend the Constitution, one of them by himself, had been submitted, very soon after the commencement of the session, and though one of those propositions, submitted by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) had been discussed, no decision had taken place on any of them. The indisposition of the gentleman, and the usual courtesy of the Senate, had influenced that postponement. It was no longer desired, however, on that ground, and therefore it had become necessary for the Senate now to decide whether they intended to act on the subject during the present session. Mr. H. had understood, from several of the members, that they deemed the present period unfavorable to the adoption of any amendment to the Constitution, and too much excitement was supposed to exist in relation to the subject-matter of the amendment—the Presidential Election. He had been informed that a majority of this House deemed it inexpedient to act on the subject during the present session. Mr. H. was not disposed to press for a decision on the amendments, if such was the fact. But, as public attention had been excited, and the people certainly were waiting with some anxiety for our decision, Mr. H. hoped that the Senate would now say whether these propositions shall be discussed and acted on during the present session, or whether they should be indefinitely postponed. For the purpose of bringing this to the test, he would move that these resolutions be made the order of the day for Monday next, and he hoped that no gentleman would vote for that proposition, who was not disposed to act decisively on the subject before the adjournment of Congress.

The motion to take up the resolutions prevailed. Mr. KING of New York, then moved for the indefinite postponement of the whole subject. This motion gave rise to considerable discussion, in which Messrs. KING of New York, HAYNE, VAN BUREN, LOWRIE, LLOYD of Maryland, MILLS, HOLMES of Maine, BELL, and DICKERSON, participated. It was contended, on the one hand, that it could not be expected by the members of the Senate, that any one of the different propositions could be adopted at the present session—that there was much other business, more immediately important, to be acted upon; as the amendment, if adopted at all, could not be adopted in season to operate upon the next election—and that a time when the public mind was not so much agitated on the subject of an election, as at present, would be more favorable to the discussion; as there might be some parts of the country which were yet waiting, in vain expectation that some amendment would be adopted at the present session, which would effect the particular course which they might see fit to pursue in regard to the next election.

In the course of this debate, Mr. VAN BUREN said, he hoped the motion made by his colleague, for indefinite postponement, would not prevail. There was not, in his judgment, any reason why the Senate could not act upon the subject as well now as at any other time. If the state of feeling on the part of the members of the Senate could possibly be supposed to create an objection to acting upon the matter at this session, it was to be regretted that that consideration had not had an earlier influence. We had commenced this business under circumstances peculiarly auspicious; the various propositions submitted had been referred to a committee of high respectability, who had, with great unanimity, reported a proposition. He thought there was adequate time to act upon the one reported. He differed from his colleague in his impression that there was any portion of the Union which expected that the Constitution would be amended in season for the next election. That was rendered impossible by the necessary process through which the amendments proposed must pass, and such, he was satisfied, was the understanding of it; and there was, therefore, no reason arising from that consideration which would render it proper to stop now, after so much progress had already been made in the subject.

Without taking the question on the motion to postpone, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 9.

The following Message was yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States.

On the 3d March, 1819, James Miller was first commissioned as Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, for the term of three years from that date.

Before the expiration of that time, and in the Winter of 1821-2, a nomination of him for re-appointment was intended, and believed by me to have been made to the Senate, and to have received the confirmation of that body.

By some accident, the cause of which is unknown, it appears that this impression was erroneous, and, in December, 1822, it was discovered that Mr. Miller had not then been recommissioned, though, in the confidence that he had been, he had continued to act in that capacity. He was then renominated to the Senate, with the additional proposal that his commission should take effect from 3d March, 1822, when his first commission had expired.

The nomination was confirmed by the Senate so far as regarded the appointment, but without concurrence in the retrospective effect proposed to be given to the commission.

His second commission, therefore, bears date on 3d January, 1823, and the interposition of the Legislature becomes necessary to legalize his official acts in the interval between 3d March, 1822, and that time a subject which I recommend to the consideration of Congress.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1822.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill to authorize the employing of certain assistants in the General Land Office, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. BARTON, the Committee on Public Lands were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Samuel Peters.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the petition of Thomas Hewes, of Louisiana, praying the restitution of a sum of money exacted from him by the marshal of Louisiana, under an execution issued against him from the district court of Vermont, in favor of the United States; alleging that the judgment was unjustly rendered against him. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. EATON, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Rezin Rawlings and John Locke, executors of Daniel Rawlings: whereupon, Mr. E. communicated additional evidence in support of the claim of the petitioners; and, on his motion, the said petition, with the additional evidence, was recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

A communication was received from the Hon

SENATE.

Ninian Edwards, a Senator from the State of Illinois, (recently appointed Minister to Mexico,) resigning his seat in the Senate; and, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, the President of the Senate was requested to inform the Executive of the State of Illinois of this resignation.

Ordered, That a member be appointed on the select committee on roads and canals, in the place of Mr. Edwards; and Mr. VAN DYKE was appointed.

The bill declaring the consent of Congress to the revocation of certain parts of the ordinances therein mentioned, and the bill for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church Parish, were severally read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the petition of James Jackson and J. C. McLamore; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the joint Library Committee on the memorial of Way & Gideon, and of Edward De Krafft; and it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing an uniform militia system throughout the United States, and providing for the discipline thereof; and it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, together with the amendment proposed thereto; and it was postponed to Friday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill allowing a drawback on the exportation of cordage manufactured in the United States from foreign hemp; and it was postponed to the 23d instant.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the several resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice President. The question was upon the motion of Mr. KING, of New York, to postpone the resolutions indefinitely.

Mr. HAYNE stated that he had this morning received information that the health of the honorable gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) who had submitted one of these resolutions, was so far restored, that he expected, in a day or two, to resume his seat; and he had, therefore, requested that the subject should be still further postponed for a few days. Mr. H. yielded cheerfully to that request; and, therefore, moved that the resolutions should, for the present, lie on the table, which was ordered accordingly.

SUPPLY OF CANNON, &c.

The bill making appropriations for the purchase of cannon, bombs, and howitz, for the fortifications of the United States, was again taken up. This bill provides an appropriation of $125,000, annually, for four years, for the purpose specified.

Mr. SMITH replied to the objections advanced by Mr. KING, of New York, against the bill, when it was before under consideration. He proceeded to show the necessity of fortifications, and their adequate armament, as an auxiliary to the Navy, in the defence of the country; and explained the course which had, hitherto, been taken by the Government, in relation to the fortifications. He explained the advantages of a specific appropriation for this object, over a dependence upon its insertion in the general annual appropriation bill; as the sum to be expended would be certain for several years, and, by making the contracts for a term of years, economy would be promoted.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said he had come to the determination not to vote for any appropriation until he thoroughly understood its object. He did not yet possess the necessary information upon this subject; which he had expected to receive from the honorable gentleman who introduced this bill, or from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, as to the state of the fortifications, and the necessity of this appropriation. Mr. H. then recapitulated the several appropriations which had been made for the fortifications, and the estimates for the same. From these statements, he inferred that the forts were not in a situation to receive the cannon, not being yet finished. He thought they would not be in readiness to receive their armament, for three or four years to come. He wished for more detailed information, as to the size of the forts, the number and kind of cannon required, the expense, &c.

Mr. JACKSON said, he had believed, that the heads of Departments were the proper persons to furnish the information relating to the business of their Departments. The information in regard to this subject had been fully furnished from the War Department, on the application of the honorable member who introduced the bill, and had been laid before the Senate. Mr. J. said he was surprised to be called upon, as chairman of the Military Committee, when such information was before the Senate, and open to every gentleman who wished to inform himself. He read the communication of the Secretary of War, in relation to the provision of cannon, &c., for the fortifications. The information contained in this communication, Mr. J. said, had entirely convinced the committee of the necessity of this measure; and they had thought that the appropriation proposed, for four years, would answer the purpose of making the purchases, at such times, and in such quantities, as the service of the country, and the state of the forts, would require. He said, he was astonished to hear from gentlemen, in this debate, that the country was to depend entirely upon its Navy for defence. The Navy was certainly a powerful arm of defence; but he considered the fortifications, also, as extremely important, as furnishing another means of defence. He well recollected with what difficulty a sufficient force had been armed to defend the country against the tomahawk and the scalping knife of a savage enemy. It was necessary to pay attention to the fortification of the frontiers of the country, as well as to the Navy, to stop the inlets, by which an enemy may penetrate into the country, and to garrison the strong points. With this protection, Mr. J. said, the militia would be able to defend their country, and he should be willing, in such a situation, to underwrite upon its safety. The information which had been received from the honorable gentleman who had introduced this bill, (Mr. SMITH,) and from the Secretary of War, may be relied upon. Unless the country was to be blessed with eternal peace, these means of defence would be found necessary. He knew how much some of the most gallant troops the country could furnish, had suffered, for want of the articles proposed to be provided by this bill; and hoped that every gentleman who retraced the circumstances of the late war, would see the necessity of providing them, and that they would vote for this and other bills, until the important inlets of the country were fortified. At these prominent points only, were fortifications necessary; but, for the want of these means of protection, much blood and treasure may be expended.

Mr. CHANDLER said he believed it only necessary for members to understand this subject, to induce them to vote for some appropriation. He stated the quantity of cannon which were now on hand, according to statements from the War Department. He thought an annual appropriation would be better than an appropriation for four years. He therefore moved to strike out "four years," and insert "one year."

Mr. DICKERSON approved the motion to change the appropriation from four years to one. He was willing to vote any sum of money that might be necessary; but thought it would be better to appropriate it as it might be wanted. The contracts for casting cannon, he thought might be made on equally as good terms, if made in each different year; and that the articles required for the forts might always be obtained, at a fair price, without binding the Government by a long contract. He was willing to vote the appropriation for a single year.

Mr. KING, of New York, was inclined to the annual appropriation, as furnishing more frequent opportunities of revising this subject; he thought it one of great importance. It might be expedient to fortify the country at certain exposed points, but he did not believe that the general feeling of the nation was in favor of a general fortification of the frontiers and the seaboard. The whole number of fortifications, proposed to be built, would cost twenty millions of dollars. He did not believe that the country ought to go so far. Another consideration was involved in this question—the support of a large standing military force; this was certainly contrary to the genius of our institutions. The Navy furnished a great arm of defence; but we have a still better reliance, in the stout hearts and strong arms of our countrymen; arm them with guns and bayonets, and they are a better defence than cannon and fortifications; this is the source to which we must look for the defence of our liberties. It is to the military that we must look for protection. The battle of Bunker's Hill furnished a proof that the hearts and arms of the yeomanry were a better reliance than cannon or forts. France had taken the notion to fortify her country; the enemy passed by her fortifications, and conquered her in the very interior of the country. She had no such militia, as the honorable gentleman from Tennessee had called to his assistance. The character and the principles of the people are what we must rely upon. If the people are not armed, give them muskets and bayonets. Mr. K. said, he would trust to Providence that, with these means, they would prove themselves not unworthy of their fathers. He believed that, with these means, the country would be able to protect itself from enemies abroad, and insurrections at home. He had no doubt that we should become a great and formidable naval Power; and to that quarter we might look for a highly important means of defence.

Mr. SMITH expressed his entire coincidence in opinion with the gentleman from New York; he did not concur in attempts to carry our plan of fortification to the extent which some persons might contemplate; but he only wished for an appropriate armament for the forts which were already built, and which were about to be completed. He went on to show the state of the fortifications which were proposed to be armed. Mr. S. said, the suffering of the country, during the Revolutionary war, would have been greatly lessened by the possession of those important means of carrying on war. Had New Orleans been properly fortified, an attack on that place, as he believed, would not have been made. If this bill were to be changed to an appropriation for a single year, its object would be lost; as a single line, in the general appropriation bill, would answer the same purpose. He considered the bill as one of economy, that twenty-five per cent. at least, would be saved by making the contracts for a term of four years.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, was satisfied, by the information he had obtained, that the cannon were about to be purchased before the forts were finished—and that large additional sums must be expended for the completion of the forts, before the cannon would be needed. He thought the Senate ought first to know what it was to cost to finish the forts; and that the bill ought to be postponed until the Military Appropriation bill was before the Senate. He, therefore, moved its postponement for a week.

Mr. CHANDLER made some further statements as to the cost of the cannon, and the quantity now on hand.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, opposed the postponement. The subject had been before the Senate for a long time, and all the information was obtained that could be furnished—he thought that information full and satisfactory; and, if postponed, there might not be time to act upon the bill, in the other House. The question of the expediency of building fortifications had long since been settled—the sites for fortifications had been surveyed, and the building of many of them had been commenced, and nearly completed. Mr. J. stated the situation of several of the forts.

Mr. SMITH made some further remarks in opposition to postponement.

Mr. BARBOUR called the attention of the Senate to the fact, that, when a proposition was made to insert a new item in an appropriation bill, from the other House, it always was objected to. He thought that the question now was, whether the object was one which ought to be carried into effect, without reference to any bill which might come from the other House. He was in favor of the appropriation, as being calculated to place our fortifications in a respectable situation. Mr. B. said, he knew something, from experience, on this subject—as the waters of his State, which were a great blessing to them in time of peace, had proved the source of bloodshed and destruction, in time of war.

He called for the yeas and nays on the question of postponement.

The question was then taken and decided against postponement—18 to 23.

The question was then taken on Mr. CHANDLER's motion, to strike out four years, and insert one year. This was decided in the negative—19 to 22.

The question was then taken, upon passing the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and decided in the affirmative—31 to 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, Knight, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Mills, Parrott, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Elliott, King of New York, Lanman, Lowrie, Macon, Palmer, Ruggles, Seymour, and Thomas.

So the bill passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

WEDNESDAY, March 10.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Jonas Alford, praying that the benefit of the fourth section of the act for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, prior to the first day of July, 1820, may be extended to him; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of Charles Gwynn, of the city of Baltimore, praying that a sum of money, erroneously paid by him into the Treasury, may be restored; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, presented the memorial of William D. Stone, praying to be permitted to locate a tract of one thousand acres of land, on the Mobile river, as an indemnity for a like quantity claimed by him under a British grant, which he states has been lost. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill "for the gradual supply of cannon, bombs, and howitz, for the fortifications," was read the third time. Mr. LOWRIE moved to amend the bill so as to extend the provisions of the bill to the purchase of "field artillery, their carriages, and caissons;" which was agreed to. The bill was then passed, and sent to the other House.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to repeal, in part, the act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Alabama Territory to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and, on motion, it was laid on the table.

The bill from the other House, to "define the boundaries of the Edwardsville and Sangamo Military Land District, in the State of Illinois," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. BARTON explained the object of the bill. It was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BROWN presented the memorial of the Legislature of Ohio, asking the assent of Congress to the sale of the school lands within that State. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill reported by the Committee on Pensions, "for the relief of Dean Weymouth," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The bill proposes to allow an additional pension to this petitioner, who was badly wounded and disabled at the battle of Chippewa.

Mr. NOBLE opposed the bill, and Messrs. LANMAN, HOLMES, of Maine, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, supported it.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, "for the relief of Alfred Moore and Sterling Orgain," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. This bill proposes to pay the petitioners for certain blacksmith's work done for the Tennessee volunteers engaged in the Seminole war.

Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, KELLY, CHANDLER, and JACKSON, spoke upon the subject. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Sarah Venable and Jane Morgan; and, no amendments having been proposed, it was reported to the House and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States, by the purchasers of public lands; and it was postponed till to-morrow.

TRANSPORTATION OF SPECIE, &c., IN PUBLIC VESSELS.

The bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, "regulating the transportation of gold and silver bullion, specie, and jewels, and carrying of passengers, and to prohibit the receipt of merchandise, in the public vessels of the United States," was again taken up for consideration, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, made a few remarks in support of the bill.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, proposed to amend the bill, so as to prohibit the public vessels of the United States from giving convoy to vessels of belligerent nations, having specie, &c., on board.

Messrs. PARROTT, LOWRIE, LLOYD, of Maryland, SMITH, and LLOYD, of Massachusetts, spoke upon the propriety of this amendment, and it was then adopted.

Mr. KING, of New York, suggested a verbal amendment, which was agreed to.

Mr. PARROTT proposed an amendment, in regard to the distribution of the commission received for the transportation of specie &c. The bill provides that one-third part of the freight money so received, shall go to the commanding officer of the vessel; one third to the commissioned officers, and the remaining third to the Navy Hospital Fund. Mr. P.'s motion was, that the commanding officer should have one-half; that one-quarter should go to the Navy Hospital Fund, and the other quarter to the Navy Pension Fund.

Some debate arose upon this motion, in which Messrs. LLOYD, of Maryland, LLOYD, of Massachusetts, CHANDLER, PARROTT, and HAYNE, took part. The Senate refused to adopt this amendment. An explanation of the object and uses of the Hospital Fund was made between Messrs. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, and SMITH.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, as amended, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

AMASA STETSON.

The bill "for the relief of Amasa Stetson," was then taken up in Committee of the Whole. The details of this claim were stated in the report of its discussion, some weeks since. The petitioner was a deputy commissary at Boston, during the late war; and he claims remuneration for losses sustained by the payment of interest on moneys advanced for the Government, and by the depreciation of the Treasury notes, and also prays compensation for extra services performed. The Committee on Claims in the Senate, reported a bill for his relief, which, after considerable discussion, was, some time since, recommitted for the purpose of allowing an additional sum to Mr. Stetson. The committee, subsequently, reported the bill, with a new section, making the additional allowances, as instructed. This bill proposes to grant Mr. Stetson, in the whole, about $8,000. Messrs. MILLS, RUGGLES, LANMAN, LOWRIE, TAYLOR of Virginia, EDWARDS and LLOYD of Massachusetts, spoke upon the claim. The question was then taken on the new section proposed by the committee, which is as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the said Amasa Stetson five hundred and fourteen dollars and eighty-five cents, being for interest on two warrants issued in his favor in 1814 and 1815, until paid; also, one thousand three hundred and eleven dollars and thirty-three cents, being for interest on two thousand and eighty-one dollars forty-nine cents, paid by the said Amasa Stetson as interest on moneys loaned him for the use of the Government, during the late war; and also, six hundred and thirty-nine dollars and seventy-two cents, being the discount on Treasury notes paid him in the year 1815.

It was determined in the negative—yeas 15 nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Elliot, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Kentucky, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, Mills, Parrott, Seymour, and Thomas.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Eaton, Edwards of Connecticut, Gaillard, Kelly, King of Alabama, Macon, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke, and Williams.

Without reporting the bill the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 11.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a naval depot at Pensacola, or at such place in the vicinity of it, as may, in their opinion, be most advantageous to the United States.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the commencement of the next session of Congress at an earlier period than the first Monday in December next.

Mr. ELLIOT presented the preamble and resolutions adopted at a convention of the citizens of Oglethorpe county, in Georgia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill now before Congress to increase the duties on imports, as unconstitutional and destructive of the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BROWN from the select committee on roads and canals, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals," reported it without amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred two resolutions upon the expediency of amending the judiciary system of the United States, reported two bills on the subject; one of which provides, that no law of any of the States shall be rendered invalid, without the concurrence of at least five Judges of the Supreme Court; their opinions to be separately expressed. The other bill provides, that there shall be two terms of the Supreme Court held annually in the City of Washington; that the United States shall be divided into ten circuit districts; the Judges of the Supreme Court to be relieved from the duty of attending the circuit courts; those courts to be held by the present district judges. These bills were severally read, and passed to a second reading.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to define the boundary line between the Edwardsville and Springfield land districts, in the State of Illinois," was read the second time, and passed.

The bill regulating the transportation of gold and silver bullion, specie and jewels, and carrying of passengers, and to prohibit the receipt of merchandise, in the public vessels of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the benefit of Alfred Moore and Sterling Orgain, assignees of Morris Linsey, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Sarah Venable and Jane Morgan was read the third time, and passed.

The bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, "to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States, by the purchasers of public lands," was then taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. Mr. KING, of Alabama, explained the views which induced the committee to report this bill; Messrs. RUGGLES and KING, of New York, made some observations in relation to it; and, on the motion of the latter gentleman, it was ordered to lie on the table.

DEAN WEYMOUTH.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Pensions, "for the relief of Dean Weymouth." In storming a battery at Bridgewater, this petitioner, then under the command of Colonel Miller, of the 21st regiment of infantry, received several severe wounds, which disabled him from procuring his subsistence by manual labor; and one of which, being through his right knee, required that his leg should be amputated. He is poor, and has a wife and child. He now receives a pension of eight dollars a month from the United States, and prays that it may be increased to fifteen dollars per month. The bill proposes thus to increase his pension.

Mr. NOBLE, although he acknowledged the merit of this petitioner, opposed the bill, on the ground that he had received as much from the Government as any other person similarly situated. Messrs. BRANCH and LOWRIE were also opposed to the bill; and it was warmly supported, on account of the meritorious services, the good character, and the complete disability of Mr. Weymouth, by Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, LANMAN, and VAN DYKE.

Mr. LOWRIE, in opposing the bill, said he considered it very important, not as respecting the individual proposed to be relieved, but as unsettling the general system of granting pensions. This individual already received a pension of $8 a month, being the maximum allowed, by the law, to persons in his situation; and, if it were thought proper to increase the pensions to such persons, he believed it would be better to alter the general law for that purpose, than to act upon individual cases. There were many persons in the country, some of whom he could name, as badly wounded as this individual, but who had been prevented, by their distance from the Seat of Government, from making application for an increase of pension. All these persons could come forward and make application to Congress, if the prayer of this petitioner was granted. It was for these reasons that he would be compelled, however his feelings might operate in favor of the individual, to vote against the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that, in order to prevent all future misunderstanding, in case the bill should pass, of the reasons for granting this pension, he wished to amend the bill, by inserting in it the words, "in consideration of his numerous and severe wounds received at the battle of Bridgewater." This amendment was agreed to. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed, to be engrossed, and read the third time—years 21, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Lanman, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Van Buren, and Van Dyke.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Branch, Edwards, Gaillard, Kelly, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lloyd of Maryland, Lowrie, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Taylor of Virginia, Ware, and Williams.

AMASA STETSON.

The unfinished business of yesterday being the bill "for the relief of Amasa Stetson," was again taken up in Committee of the Whole, and reported to the Senate.

Mr. MILLS moved to amend the bill, by inserting the additional section which was reported by the Committee on Claims, and rejected yesterday in Committee of the Whole, so far as that section provides for the payment of interest to Mr. Stetson. This amendment was adopted—19 to 13; and the bill, as thus amended, was passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile; and, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 12.

JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of James Brown, (appointed Minister to France,) produced his credentials, was qualified, and he took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. LOWRIE, three hundred additional copies of the report of the Secretary of State, of the 27th of January last, on domestic manufactures, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Reuben Colburn, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

On motion by Mr. BELL, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the consideration of the petition of James Thomas, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MILLS presented additional evidence in support of the claim of Martin Lincoln and Ann F. Humphreys; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. BARTON, the Committee on Public Lands were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Jonas Alford.

Mr. PARROTT presented the petition of Henry S. Langdon, late a navy agent at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, praying remuneration for losses sustained by him on Treasury notes; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, presented the memorial of Benjamin Ferguson, and others, citizens of Maryland, praying the erection of additional light-houses on the Chesapeake bay; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, gave notice that he would, on Monday next, ask leave to bring in a bill to provide for the appointment of a Surveyor General for the lands of the United States for the State of Louisiana, and one Surveyor General for the State of Mississippi.

On motion by Mr. TALBOT, the Message from the President of the United States, on the 23d December last, on the subject of the longitude of the Capitol, was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Amasa Stetson was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Dean Weymouth was read the third time, and passed.

The bill further to amend the judicial system of the United States, and provide for the holding of circuit courts; and the bill further to amend the judicial system of the United States; were severally read the second time.

On motion by Mr. VAN BUREN, the last mentioned bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, to instruct the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing a naval depot at or near Pensacola, and agreed thereto.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, instructing an inquiry into the expediency of providing, by law, for an earlier day than the first Monday in December next, for the commencement of the next session of Congress, was again read.

On the suggestion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the resolution was so modified as to direct the committee to inquire at what time the present session of Congress may be closed. As thus amended, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill "explanatory of an act, entitled "An act confirming certain claims to lots in the town of Mobile," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. KING, of Alabama, briefly explained the object of the bill; which was merely to do away a misconception which had been put upon a former act. After some remarks by Messrs. CHANDLER and LOWRIE, the bill was laid on the table.

The bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," was taken up. Mr. TALBOT submitted a new bill, as an amendment to the one originally before the Senate; and the subject was then postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

LAWS OF ALABAMA.

The bill "to amend the ordinance of the State of Alabama, in relation to the navigable waters of the State," was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TALBOT stated that the object of this bill was merely to place the State of Alabama on the same footing as every other State in the Union. By the article in the act admitting her into the Union, she was prohibited from imposing any tolls or exaction upon the navigation of her waters. It was now highly necessary, in order to promote the improvements contemplated in that State, to repeal this restriction. He thought there ought to be no difference, in this respect, between those States who were members of the Union when the present happy Constitution was adopted, and those which have since been admitted. If the State of Alabama should pass any law imposing an oppressive and unconstitutional toll or exaction, that law would come under the correction of the Supreme Court.

Mr. VAN BUREN said he was in the minority on the committee that reported this bill, and subsequent reflection had confirmed him in the opinion that the bill ought not to pass. Before the State of Alabama was admitted into the Union, she was required to pass an ordinance that the then navigable waters within her territories should be forever free from toll or exaction to her own citizens, and to the citizens of the other States. This ordinance accompanied the act for her admission. She now applies for the revocation of that ordinance. There is nothing peculiar in her situation. The other new States are subject to similar restrictions. If this ordinance should be revoked, the same measure should be dealt out to all the other States. He had examined the laws for the admission of the other States, and found the same conditions attached to them. Mr. V. B. proceeded to explain the provisions which had been adopted in regard to other States on this subject. He believed the people of Alabama themselves would not require this revocation, if they would thoroughly consider the effect of this provision; it was a matter of great importance to them. In the old States, all the powers over their waters, which were not surrendered to the Government at the adoption of the Constitution, were reserved to those States. This reservation of a part of the power was calculated to bring them into collision with each other. The citizens of the new States have a check upon their own Legislatures which those of the old States have not. These checks he considered very advantageous. The people were protected by their own stipulations from any oppressive exactions, by acts of their own Legislatures. He went on to show the difficulties which would arise from an attempt, on the part of any one of the States commanding the great Western rivers, to control the navigation of those rivers. It was a paternal interest for the new States, Mr. V. B. said, that had produced this stipulation.

Mr. BROWN objected to the propriety of imposing restrictions upon the people to protect them against themselves. He contended that, if the people of the new States were supposed to be capable of governing themselves, they ought to be vested with all the attributes of State sovereignty; and that there ought to be no reservation or retention of those rights which belonged to the other States. He adduced some other instances of similar reservations of power; such as a reservation of the title to the salt spring lands. He thought the State of Alabama should be placed on the same footing as the other States. She wishes only to remove obstructions in her navigation; and intends to impose no higher tolls upon the citizens of the other States than upon her own citizens. He considered it impolitic and unwise to impose this restriction.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, considered this the same question that was agitated on the admission of Missouri into the Union. He resisted the supposition of a power, on the part of the General Government, to impose restrictions upon the States, in regard to their legislation. The present proposition is, that the State of Alabama shall have power to impose tolls, for the improvement of her navigation. Mr. H. said, he had supposed they possessed that power; but as they consider the restraint in this ordinance a stumbling-block in their way, the inquiry is, whether it ought now to be removed? Mr. H. contended that it ought to be removed; that these new States ought not to be held in leading-strings, or as colonial governments, or to be restrained from legislating as the other States may do. He denied the right to impose any restriction or limitation upon the power of legislating; and contended that every new State, admitted into the Union, must be admitted with the same powers and privileges as the other States. If it were not so, the equilibrium of the Government would be destroyed, by the difference in the powers appertaining to the different States. The State had no right to surrender, nor had the General Government any right to receive, any part of that power which belonged of right to every individual State in the Confederacy.

Mr. RUGGLES moved the recommitment of the bill, with instructions to the committee to inquire into the expediency of making the bill general in its provisions, and applicable to all those States, in relation to which there exist similar restrictions.

Mr. LOWRIE moved that the bill should be laid upon the table. This motion was rejected by the casting vote of the Chair.

Mr. VAN BUREN, in answer to Mr. HOLMES, denied entirely, that this question was similar to that involved in the discussion on the admission of Missouri into the Union.

MESSRS. NOBLE, SMITH, KING, of Alabama, H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, KING, of New York, TAYLOR, of Virginia, and THOMAS, continued the debate on this question—after which, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, who stated that he was not yet prepared to vote upon the bill, it was ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, March 15.

Mr. HENRY JOHNSON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the appointment of a Surveyor General of the lands of the United States for the State of Louisiana, and one Surveyor General of the lands of the United States for the State of Mississippi; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ELLIOTT presented the memorial of Ezekiel Wimberly, in behalf of the citizens of Twiggs county, in Georgia, and the remonstrance of Thomas Foad, and others, citizens of Baldwin county, in Georgia, severally remonstrating against the passage of the bill now before Congress, to increase the duties on imports, as unconstitutional, and highly injurious to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Charles S. Hempstead, and others, members of the bar, in the State of Missouri, praying that the times appointed for holding the district court in that State may be changed; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion, by Mr. BENTON, the Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Samuel J. Axson.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, two hundred copies of the documents, referred to in the Message of the President of the United States of the 24th of February last, on the subject of the claim of Massachusetts for military services, was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the trustees of the town of St. Charles, in Missouri, made a report, which was read and considered; and in concurrence therewith, resolved, that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of this subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the joint Library Committee on the memorial of Way and Gideon, and of Edward De Kraft; and in concurrence therewith, the committee were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

CASE OF REUBEN COLBURN.

The report of the Committee on Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Reuben Colburn, was taken up for consideration. This petitioner prays compensation for two hundred and twenty bateaux, built in 1775, for the use of the troops of Colonel Arnold, then about to march into Canada; and for sundry other services rendered, and disbursements made for the country at that time. He states, that he delivered over his accounts and vouchers for said disbursements and services, to the commissioner appointed by Congress for auditing and settling the accounts of the State of Massachusetts against the United States; that they were either lost or mislaid by said commissioner, and that they were not acted upon, nor could be obtained, for several years thereafter, to be exhibited again for settlement. He, therefore, prays that Congress would adjust his account, and pay him the balance due thereon. The committee report, that the great lapse of time, since the services of the petitioner were rendered, and the loss of public records and documents relating to the accounts of that period, render it doubtful whether he has any just claim upon the Government. They believe that the security of the Government, against unjust and fraudulent claims, requires that a lapse of time, such as has occurred in this case, should be regarded as a bar to all claims of a doubtful character; and that, therefore, the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. CHANDLER opposed the report of the committee, and moved to reverse it. Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, also spoke in opposition to the report, and Messrs. BELL and RUGGLES supported it. The question, on reversing the report, was then put, and decided in the negative—12 to 16. The report of the committee was then agreed to.

MILITIA SYSTEM.

The bill, reported by the Committee on the Militia, "more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States, and providing for the discipline thereof," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHANDLER briefly explained the objects of the bill, and the points upon which it varies from the present laws on the same subject.

Mr. SMITH suggested the propriety of taking up the bill by separate sections.

The first section having been read accordingly,

Mr. CHANDLER stated that the only variation between this section and the existing law is, that it provides for a general registering of all the persons liable to do military duty. This section was amended by an insertion, to make it applicable, as well to the Territories and to the District of Columbia, as to the several States.

The second section specifies those who shall be exempted from the provisions of the act. They are the same as are now exempted by law from the performance of militia services.

The third section provides for the arrangement of the militia of the respective States, into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, as the Legislature of each State may direct.

Mr. C. stated that there was only an immaterial alteration proposed, by this section, from the existing system.

Mr. HAYNE objected to this section, as it provides for an arrangement of the militia, which has already been made.

Mr. CHANDLER stated that the object of this bill was to repeal all other laws on the subject, and embody the whole militia system in one general bill, in order that the officers and men might see, at one view, what their duty was, and what would be required of them.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the section was amended by inserting, after the time of six months, within which the arrangement is to take place, the words "where such arrangement has not already been made."

The fourth section respects the elite companies of each battalion, their officers, arms, equipments, &c. It differs from the present system only by providing that, where there are no companies of grenadiers, light infantry, or riflemen, the two oldest companies in the regiment shall act as light infantry; and that, whenever any non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, of the cavalry, shall neglect, for the space of two months, to keep a horse, he shall be discharged from the cavalry, and be required immediately to do duty in the infantry.

The fifth section provides "that the militia, enrolled as aforesaid, shall, within twelve months from and after the passing of this act, be divided into two corps. All those above the age of 18, and under the age of 28 years, shall form one corps, to be denominated the select corps. And all over the age of 28, and under the age of 45 years, shall form the other corps, to be denominated the reserve corps. Both the corps to be and remain under the same organization, and under the officers, as is before provided, and shall be called out, by companies, one day in each year, together, for the inspection of arms, and for the purpose of improvement in discipline."

Mr. CHANDLER stated that, under the provisions of this section, the select corps would probably consist of about 858,000, and the reserve corps about 400,000 or 500,000; and that the expense of time, &c., would not be greater than is at present incurred.

Mr. LOWRIE thought the number of the select corps would be too great, and the expense too burdensome. He moved to reduce the greatest age of that corps, in this section, from 28 to 24 years. He thought it would be a curious select corps which consisted of half a million of men, and that the smaller number would be the more efficient. He was, however, opposed to the section altogether.

Messrs. SMITH, HOLMES of Maine, and CHANDLER, were opposed to the reduction of the specified age, and Mr. MILLS spoke in favor of it. The question on striking out 28 years was put, and carried. A motion to fill the blank with 26 years was lost. It was then moved to insert 25 years; which was adopted.

The sixth section was then read. It provides that the select corps, together with all the officers and non-commissioned officers of the militia, shall be called out four days at one time in each year, by division, brigade, regiment, or battalion, for the purpose of training and perfecting them in military discipline. It further provides that officers shall be daily detailed to command and train the troops so called out; and those officers who are not so detailed, shall be exercised and instructed in the line of their duty by some of the officers best qualified for that purpose; so that each officer will have an opportunity of commanding and receiving instruction during the four days aforesaid. It is left to the respective States to furnish the troops with such tents, camp equipage, and rations, as they may think proper.

Mr. MILLS objected to this section of the bill, as transcending the powers vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States. He read the Constitutional provision on this subject, which gives to Congress the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and governing such parts as may be employed in the service of the United States, but which reserves the authority of training the militia, to the States, respectively. Mr. M. then proceeded to show the incompatibility which he supposed to exist between this article of the Constitution and the sixth section of this bill.

Mr. BRANCH also opposed this section. Messrs. CHANDLER, BARBOUR, and HOLMES of Maine, contended against the unconstitutionality of this section.

Mr. HAYNE moved to strike out the section, on the ground of its obvious opposition to the Constitution, and made some remarks in support of his motion.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, March 16.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew Low and others, made a report, accompanied by a resolution that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles Gwynn, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Charles Gwynn, of Baltimore; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Martin Lincoln and Ann F. Humphreys, reported a bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Benjamin Lincoln and others; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of Elijah Van Syckle, of Philadelphia, praying that the duties which accrued on the importation of a quantity of sugar may be remitted, in consideration of the said sugar having been afterwards consumed by fire; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill to provide for the appointment of a Surveyor General of the lands of the United States for the State of Louisiana, and one Surveyor General of the lands of the United States for the State of Mississippi, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1824;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was twice read, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt" was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The question was upon the amendment heretofore proposed by Mr. VAN BUREN.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, that when this subject was before under consideration, he had stated, that, when it came up again for discussion, he would submit to the Senate, from an authentic source, a statement, not to be questioned, of the situation, and of the number of persons in confinement for debt in the city of Boston; whether it tended to the credit or the discredit of that good old city. This, perhaps, he would not have done had he expected, that, for a long month then to come, the subject would have slept upon the table; for, whatever of wisdom this lapse of time may have given to our deliberations, it certainly had added nothing to the ardor or to the interest of the debate; but, as he had given the pledge, he would redeem it; indeed, after the statements that had been made, and certain terrific stories now also afloat, he would not willingly omit the doing it; for, although these allegations were of too grave and melancholy a cast to be trifled with, he was not disposed to shrink from a comparison of the city of Boston with that of any other city in this Union; on the contrary, he asked for no indulgence—he solicited no forbearance; if there was any thing in the laws or usages of Massachusetts, in reference to the imprisonment of debtors, which was justly a matter of reproach, he was ready to hear it, and to admit it or repel it; lamentable, however, was the state of that city, whose reputation must be dependent upon the evil conduct of one of her inhabitants.

Before, however, he presented the statements to which he had alluded, he would again repeat, he was not inimical to the principle of the bill; he had never been opposed to it; he had been its advocate; and, if a provision were ingrafted on it, requiring that an insolvent debtor, before availing himself of the benefits of the bill, should be required to make a disclosure of his concerns, and a surrender of his effects for the benefit of his creditors, generally, he would cheerfully vote for the bill; nay, he would go farther; for if, under these circumstances, the debtor was honest, he would not only exempt his person from future arrest—he would, also, forever after, exempt from seizure or liability the future product of his earnings or his industry.

He was so far from being opposed to the bill, he said, he considered the existing insolvent laws of the several States as a disgrace to the country, as offering a bounty to fraud, and as a reproach to the humanity of the age in which we live. He had, however, strong objections to the bill, although he might eventually vote for it under almost any provisions. His objection to the bill arose, first, from the possibility that it might prevent something better; and next, because, except, perhaps, as a precedent and example, even if it passed, it was, as he thought, worth nothing. It could apply only to persons imprisoned for debt under executions issuing from processes in the courts of the United States; for, whether the legislation on this head, by the several States, be good or bad, the present bill would not touch it. On that head a limit is distinctly prescribed. If the State laws conflict not with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, you cannot meddle with them; if you do, or if you attempt it, the States will pay just as much attention to your mandates, as the waves of the ocean paid to the mandates of Canute the Great, when he ordered them to stop at his bidding, and no more.

Mr. L. said he had believed the bill would not have applied to an individual in the State of Massachusetts; but he was mistaken on this point, and, when in error, and convinced of it, he was ever ready to avow it; he fortunately had at his command, at this time, the means of indisputably ascertaining the fact. The United States District Attorney for Massachusetts was now at Washington, and he had referred to him, and been informed that, although for many months previously, not a human being, to his knowledge—and from his official station he could not but be conversant with the fact—not a human being had been in confinement for debt under processes from the United States courts; but that, unhappily, at this moment, such was not the case. How many, then, are there, sir, so imprisoned? Let me tell you. One single, solitary individual. How came he there? He had been imprisoned at his own solicitation, in order that he might avail himself of the humane provisions of the act of June, 1798, for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts due to the United States, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, under certain circumstances, to release the debtor. So much for the actual state of imprisonment for debt in Massachusetts, upon which this bill can be brought to operate.

Having shown this, Mr. L. said, although whether it be more or less, or whether this bill passes or not, it could not be operated upon by it, he would next proceed to show the number and situation of persons imprisoned for debt in the city of Boston under the laws of the State; and he would do this from authentic records, to which he challenged contradiction. In doing it, the first document to which he would refer was to a letter under date of the 1st of the present month, from a highly respectable gentleman of that city, Judge Thatcher, the Judge of the Municipal Court, whose duty it is to have under his cognizance, and to take especial care of, the prisons within its precincts, and the persons confined in them, and whose testimony could not be impeached. This gentleman writes that—

"The care of the jail in this city belongs to the Mayor and Aldermen, as successors to the Court of Sessions. By an act, passed in February, 1822, it is made the duty of the Board of Accounts, and the Justices of the Police Court, to visit the jail once in a quarter, and all other places of confinement and punishment of crimes and offences, or for the non-payment of debts, within this county; to make report to the Mayor and Aldermen of their proceedings; to state all grievances, mismanagements, and negligences, which they find to exist; and to suggest such changes and improvements as they may deem wise and expedient. Since I have belonged to the Board, I know that this has been done. It has been their practice to visit each room, and to ascertain the actual condition of the prisoners, giving them opportunity to make complaint, should any such exist. The quarterly reports of these visitors will evince the interest they have taken in the painful performance of this trust; and, from my own observation, I am perfectly satisfied of the correctness of the reports made by the grand jury. Being desirous that the city should stand vindicated, in your opinion, from an imputation of inhumanity on this subject, and that you may, if necessary, be able to refer to the enclosed documents, I hope you will deem it a sufficient apology for my troubling you with this statement."

This, sir, said Mr. L., was the authentic and official source from which this information had been derived; and the documents alluded to, are the following, two of which are adduced at different seasons of the year, to show, that no collusive selection of a favorable moment of exhibition has been resorted to. The first is, the report of the Grand Jury of the "Municipal Court of the city of Boston, in August term, 1823," as follows, viz:

"That the Grand Jury, in compliance with their duty, and the charge delivered to them by the honorable the Judge of the Municipal Court of the city of Boston, at the present term, on the subject of jails, have this day attended to that duty, and report:

"That they went through all parts of both buildings, and entered the several rooms and cells of the prisoners, to ascertain the condition of the same, and to give the prisoners an opportunity to communicate their wants and complaints, in case any existed."

"The apartments of the debtors, male and female, were generally clean; there was no indication of a want of personal cleanliness, or of suffering; the bread furnished both to them and to those confined for offences, was of a sweet and wholesome quality, and good health generally prevailed in the jail; the Jury were very particular in their inquiries of the various classes of prisoners, and were highly gratified in finding them, uniformly, satisfied with the quantity and quality of the bread and meats, as well as the quantity, quality, and frequency of the water."

"The Jury found the persons committed for debt, separate and apart from felons, convicts, and those committed or charged of any infamous crime. The jail appeared to be kept with due regard to discipline, order, and safety, and there did not appear to the Jury any turbulence or noise, but, on the contrary, in many of the rooms, both those appropriated for debtors, as well as criminals, the inmates were engaged in reading."

"The rooms and avenues of the jail appeared to the Jury to be well ventilated—walls clean, and air not impure; in fact, owing to such a state of cleanliness must be imputed the general health that prevails throughout the prison.”

“The Jury find the whole number of persons confined for debt to be—

Male debtors	-	-	-	-	23
Female debtors	-	-	-	-	2
					—25!!”

The record is signed by the foreman, August 11, 1823.

The next document to be produced, is a like report of a similar Grand Jury, made so late as within the last month of February—presented to the court—transmitted to the Mayor and Aldermen, and, by them, ordered to be published; in which it is stated, “that the Jury have, this day, (February 6,) gone through and inspected every apartment in both buildings, (the jails,) and made all necessary inquiries of the prisoners, as to their treatment, fare, &c., and they were gratified to find them generally satisfied with the quality and quantity of the provisions served to them, and with their personal treatment; particularly those confined for debt, from whom not a word of complaint, in any respect, was uttered by a single individual; that the buildings were sufficiently ventilated, comfortably warmed, clean in the apartments and passage ways, and the whole interior made sweet and pure by the application of lime; that the jail is under good discipline, prisoners orderly, and generally in a healthy state; and that the whole number confined for debt, was”—not fourteen hundred, nor after the rate of three or four thousand in three years—“but, actually, twenty-two!”

This, sir, said Mr. LLOYD, is so much of these reports as has reference to the subject under discussion. They speak for themselves—and not having intended, nor now intending, to enter into debate, on this bill, here he should leave them. The occasion did not, in his opinion, make it necessary, even that he should attempt to render a feeble tribute of justice to the city of Boston. He would not, therefore, point to her origin, than which, no people could trace one more pure or more honorable. He would not ask that her Revolutionary history should be retraced, nor that regard should be given to any, or to all her noble institutions; to the numerous temples she had erected for the worship of the ever-living God, the giver of every good gift; to the university, in her neighborhood, of which she is the patroness—the pride and the ornament of our country; to her numerous public schools, where the infant of the poorest inhabitant, as soon as he can lisp his letters, at four years, is taken under public tuition, and continued there, without expense to his parents, until he is, not unfrequently, turned out, at the age of fifteen, a scholar that would do credit to the seminaries of Eton or of Westminster. He said he would not ask the Senate to refer to her magnificent, charitable endowments, her asylums for orphans, male and female; her spacious alms-houses, retreat for the insane, and general hospital; some of them equal, in external beauty, to the presidential palace, and exceeding it in their dimensions. He would not ask that the unexampled munificence of her citizens should be remembered, one of whom, by a single donation, to a single institution, within even the last six months, had given, in money, or what had already realized it, more than one hundred thousand dollars. Rival it elsewhere, if you can, sir. He would attempt nothing of this. His task was a humbler and less grateful one; it was to tell the truth respecting her prisons, always the abode of misfortune and misery, and to ask you, also, to look at them. It was not requisite that he should become the panegyrist of a city which did not need his support, and whose merits, wherever known, would speak, trumpet-tongued, her own best eulogy.

When Mr. LLOYD had concluded—

Mr. MACON proposed an amendment, to limit the operation of the bill to all contracts made after the 1st of July next; and thus to take away its retrospective character.

Mr. BARBOUR said, it was his opinion, that the bill ought to apply to all contracts, as well those which have been, as those which may be hereafter, made; but, for the sake of compromise, he should vote for the amendment.

The question was then taken, on the amendment proposed by Mr. MACON, and passed in the affirmative.

Mr. VAN BUREN made a few remarks, in explanation of his amendment. The question was upon adopting his substitute for the first section of the bill; which substitute provides that, on an affidavit of the debtor's intention to leave the country, substantiated by the evidence of two credible witnesses, the creditor shall have a right to hold him to bail.

Mr. MILLS suggested several amendments to this section. One of which, proposing to strike out the clause requiring the evidence of two witnesses, in order to hold to bail, gave rise to some debate; in which, Messrs. MILLS, TALBOT, and TAYLOR, of Virginia, advocated, and Messrs. BARBOUR and VAN BUREN, opposed it. The amendment was agreed to.

An amendment proposed by Mr. TALBOT, subjecting the creditor, if there should not appear to have been sufficient cause for holding to bail, to a suit for damages, was discussed, and subsequently withdrawn by the mover. The question upon the substitute for the first section, as proposed by Mr. VAN BUREN, was then put, and carried in the affirmative.

The substitute for the fourth section was then taken up.

Mr. VAN BUREN stated the difference between the two sections. The original section in the bill provides that on a return of no property found, upon a fieri facias, the plaintiff may file an affidavit that he has good cause to believe that a fraudulent conveyance, or concealment of property, has taken place; and then, after summons to the party, so charged, a jury shall be impanelled to try the fact, &c. The proposed amendment provides, that the party so charged shall be held to bail, on receiving such summons, to respond to it. This amendment was supported by Messrs. VAN BUREN, MILLS, and BROWN, and opposed by Messrs. EATON, TALBOT, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky. The question was then taken on striking out the fourth section of the original bill, and decided in the affirmative. The question before the Senate, was then upon inserting the section proposed by Mr. VAN BUREN, in lieu of the fourth section. Mr. HAYNE proposed to amend the amendment, so as to permit the creditor to file the affidavit of his belief of a fraudulent intention to convey or conceal property, upon the judgment or decree of the court, without waiting for the return of the feri facias. Without taking the question, the Senate, on motion of Mr. TALBOT, adjourned till to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 17.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting the official emoluments and expenditures of certain officers of the customs, and an abstract of the fees received on certificates to accompany distilled spirits, wines, and teas, commissions on disbursements as superintendents of lighthouses, and as agents for the marine hospital.

Mr. BENTON presented the petitions of David Martin and Elkanah English, soldiers in the Army of the United States during the late war, who received injuries while in the service of the country, and pray that they may be placed on the pension list.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAYNE presented the preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Sumter district, in South Carolina, remonstrating against the passage of the bill, now before Congress, to increase the duties on imports; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thaddeus Mayhew, reported a bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. TALBOT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill further to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Finance, on the petition of Andrew Low and others; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill releasing to John McAlister, or the legal representatives of John Forbes, a certain tract of land; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution proposing an additional rule for conducting business in the Senate; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts, together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands; and it was postponed to to-morrow.

The bill, reported by the Committee on Claims, for the relief of Samuel White, was taken up, in Committee of the Whole. This bill provides for the repayment of the excise duty paid on two stills. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The bill, reported by the Committee on Finance, "for the relief of Napier, Rapelye, Bennett, Petray, and Viel," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. HAYNE explained the grounds upon which this bill was founded. It provides for the repayment to these petitioners, merchants of Charleston, South Carolina, of duties paid to the United States, on certain goods imported into St. Augustine, previous to the cession of Florida to the United States. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported on the petition of Comfort Smith. She prays that her husband, who is entitled to a pension for his Revolutionary services, but cannot be placed on the list, in consequence of insanity, by which he is rendered incompetent to take the requisite oath, may be placed on the list, without taking the oath. The committee reported a bill granting the prayer of the petitioners; which was passed to a second reading.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of the bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," was resumed, in Committee of the Whole.

The fourth section of the original bill having been stricken out, yesterday, the question was upon inserting a new section, proposed in lieu of it, by Mr. VAN BUREN, which provides that, on a return of no property found, upon a feri facias, the plaintiff may file an affidavit that he has good cause to believe that a fraudulent conveyance, or concealment of property, has been made by the debtor; and then, after summons to the party so charged, a jury shall be impannelled to try the fact; and, upon the finding of the fact, execution to issue against the body; the party to be deprived of the benefit of the prison bounds, until discharged by due course of law. Upon the summons aforesaid, the party so charged is to be required to give bail, to respond to the summons. Mr. HAYNE had moved to amend the proposed section, so as to permit the creditor to file the affidavit of his belief of a fraudulent intention to convey or conceal property, upon the judgment or decree of the court, without waiting for the return of the feri facias. Mr. HAYNE withdrew his amendment, to give place to others proposed, in the details of the section, by Mr. VAN BUREN, which were adopted; and Mr. H. then renewed his motion, and made some remarks in favor of it. The amendment was then agreed to. An amendment proposed by

SENATE.

Mr. EATON was rejected. The question was then taken upon inserting the section, as thus amended, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. BRANCH moved to amend the bill, by inserting a new section, providing that no person, who shall have been convicted, by a jury, under the provisions of this act, of an intention to defraud persons holding just claims against him, by the conveyance or concealment of property, shall be competent to give evidence, in any matter, either civil or criminal, which may come before the courts of the United States. This amendment was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, HOLMES, of Maine, TALBOT, LANMAN, and VAN BUREN. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLY suggested some points in which he considered the bill as being yet deficient, in relation to the means of the creditor to compel the debtor to surrender his property; to which suggestions Mr. VAN BUREN replied.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and, with the several amendments made in Committee of the Whole, was postponed till Friday next, and made the order of that day.

THURSDAY, March 18.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to enable the President to carry into effect the treaty made at Ghent, the 24th of December 1814, excluding foreigners from trade and intercourse with Indian tribes within the United States, and to preserve the fur trade within the limits of the said United States; he also communicated sundry documents in relation thereto. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the documents ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the petition of Thomas Evans and Thomas Cop-puck, and the memorial of William F. Chesley, and others, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioners and memorialists ought not to be granted.

Mr. McILVAINE, from the select committee on roads and canals, to whom was referred the memorial of I. L. Skinner, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner. The report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

Mr. McILVAINE presented the memorial of Clayton Lamb, and others; of Anthony S. Earl, and others, of Burlington county, New Jersey; and of Paul Burd, and others, severally praying that additional duties may be imposed on imported iron, and on the manufactures thereof; he also presented the memorial of Joseph Sykes, and others, farmers of New Jersey, praying that the duties on imports may be increased. The memorials were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill for the relief of Charles Gwynn, of Baltimore; the bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Benjamin Lincoln, and others; the bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew; the bill further to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; and the bill for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine, were severally read the second time.

The bill for the relief of Samuel White, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Napier, Rapelye, and Bennett, and Petray and Viel, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, reported by the Committee on Pensions, "for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. This bill authorizes the person, for whose relief it is drawn, to receive a pension to which he is entitled by Revolutionary services, but which he has hitherto been prevented from receiving, in consequence of insanity, which incapacitates him from taking the oath required by law. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of the bill "better to secure public moneys in the hands of clerks, marshals, and attorneys," was resumed. This bill was, on yesterday, reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate. Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to strike out the fifth section of the bill; which requires all the public officers, receiving fees, to transmit to the Treasury Department, annually, on oath, a particular statement of the fees received by them, and the amount of public moneys remaining in their hands. Mr. J thought it would give a great deal of trouble to the officers specified, without producing any advantage to the Government. Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, opposed the motion to strike out the section. The question on that motion was then put, and rejected. The bill was then passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts, together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands; and, on motion, laid on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the various joint resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the election of President and Vice President, were taken up for consideration.

Mr. MILLS moved that the further consideration of these resolutions be indefinitely postponed. He said he was induced to make this motion, from a full conviction that the subject could not be acted upon at the present session of Congress, and that, therefore, it would be useless to consume time in the discussion.

Mr. BRANCH opposed the indefinite postponement, and called for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. KING, of New York, observed, that the excitement respecting the next election, had become such among the people, and in Congress, who had been, for the two last years, much occupied about it, that the sober and impartial examination of the very important subject of amendments of the Constitution, cannot be now expected. The amendments should, therefore, be postponed to a period when the Senate may hope for a more temperate and rational examination of them than at the present time can take place.

Without entering into any examination of the proposed amendments, he should vote for their postponement, not only for the reasons which he had assigned, but for another, and, as he thought, a still more important consideration; in referring to which, he must request that he might not be supposed to want respect for, or to claim authority over, the opinions of any member of the Senate. We all stand here as equals, and it was for this cause, after the expression of his deference to the rights of others, he hoped, without offence, that he might exercise his own rights. He should, therefore, proceed, after touching on certain fundamental provisions of the Constitution, or bond of union, of the United States, constituting what he called the true balance of power in our political system, to draw the attention of the Senate to a new, extraordinary, self-created, central power, stronger than the power of the Constitution, which has risen up, at the Seat of Government; a power which has assumed the direction and control of the fundamental provisions of the Constitution, relative to the election of the President. In attempting to reform the Constitution, it is not only necessary correctly to understand its established and well-considered regulations, but to make inquiry concerning the manner in which these regulations have been observed, and the advantages or disadvantages which are found by experience to proceed from the observance of or departure from the established provisions of the compact, by which, under the guarantee of all to each, the States expected to remain separate, coequal, and sovereign republics.

It is, therefore, expedient, on a motion for the indefinite postponement of the proposed amendments of the Constitution, in whatever light we may have hitherto regarded them, to allude to, to designate, and call upon the Senate to examine, the nature, tendency, and danger, of this new and extraordinary power, which has risen up, and established itself, at the very Seat of Government; which has already assumed authority unknown to the Constitution, and threatens to overturn the balance of power, proceeding from its division and distribution between the States and United States.

We all know that the Constitution of the United States is the fundamental act of the union of the States, defining the power yielded by each State to the United States, establishing the reciprocal rights and duties of the States and of the United States, and, in respect to the latter, determining the manner in which their authority shall be exercised.

The authority of the United States is divided into three great departments, and the manner of appointing the members of each department is equally fundamental as their division, and necessarily excludes every other manner of division or appointment.

The dangers to which experience had shown that the election of Executive Chiefs are liable; dangers which had led other nations to prefer hereditary to elective Executives, were, without doubt, well considered by the members of the General Convention, who, nevertheless, did indulge the hope, by apportioning, limiting, and confining the Electors within their respective States, and by the guarded manner of giving and transmitting the ballots of the Electors to the Seat of Government, that intrigue, combination, and corruption, would be effectually shut out, and a free and pure election of the President of the United States made perpetual.

At an early day, however, and on the first and only difficulty which has ever occurred in the manner of electing the President, an alteration of the Constitution was made by the States. This alteration, which now forms the Constitution upon the subject, while it may prevent what, at the moment, was believed by a majority of the States to be a mischief, which was feared only, as it never happened, has unfortunately left the United States unprotected against present and future evils of greater magnitude, against which the primitive provision would have proved an adequate security.

The excitement of that period, proceeding from causes not likely again to have happened, admonishes us against future alterations at periods of agitation, and dissuade from proposing further alteration at this time.

The Constitution provides that the President and Vice President shall be elected in this manner: Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of Electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. They shall name, in their ballots, the person voted for as President, and, in distinct ballots, the person voted for as Vice President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and, if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other Constitutional disability of the President.

Such are the actual provisions of the Constitution respecting the election of the President. The Constitution itself, as we are informed by the report of the Convention to the Old Congress, was the result of a spirit of amity, and of mutual deference and concession; greater powers were surrendered to the United States by the large States than by the small ones, because their numbers and resources were greater.

The House of Representatives is composed on the basis of the numbers of the respective States, the small States here yielding to the large ones, and the Senate is composed on the basis of the equality of the States, the larger States here, in turn, deferring to the small ones. The Executive is chosen by neither rule, but by the influence of both rules united; it is well known that the small States would not have consented to the choice by Electors, a mode favorable to the large States; but, upon the consent of the large States, on the failure of the choice of the President by the Electors on the first trial, that the House of Representatives voting by States, the representation from each State having one vote, shall choose the President, not from those they deem the most worthy, but from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for by the Electors, thereby restricting the choice of the House of Representatives to the three highest candidates nominated by the large States. To this adjustment, which was brought about by compromise between the States, no objections were made at the period when the Constitution was afterwards under the discussion of the several States. Though great difficulties occurred in the debates of the State conventions on other portions of the Constitution of the United States, no opposition appeared to the provisions of the Constitution respecting the manner of electing the President, and no such objection occurred until the fourth election of the President, which was made by the House of Representatives; since that period, five Presidential elections have taken place, and, in eight of the nine elections, the President has been chosen by the Electors; the fourth election is the only instance in which the President, not being chosen by the Electors, the election devolved on the House of Representatives. The compromise, on the subject of the Presidential election, which has been always binding in honor and good faith, seems of late to have been forgotten; and dissatisfaction and complaint have appeared at the seat of government in Virginia, New York, and other States, that the influence of the great States was unreasonably impaired by the provision of the Constitution, that, after the failure to choose the President by the Electors, the election should devolve upon the House of Representatives, although the House of Representatives is restricted to the choice of the President from three candidates, nominated by the Electors, a majority of whom are appointed by the large States. Hence it has happened, from year to year, that attempts have been made by certain States to alter the Constitution on the subject of the Presidential election, notwithstanding this election is matter of compromise and compact between the States, without which no Constitution or Union could have been formed. Hitherto these attempts have all failed, and, since the addition of so many new States, the probability of any alteration of the Constitution is much diminished; but, while the chance of any regular alteration is lessened, the dangers of the Constitution are much increased. The formidable central power, which has appeared at the Seat of Government, which is neither deputed from nor apportioned by any established rule among the States, but proceeding from a self-created body, unknown to the Constitution—a body which acknowledges no law founded upon common and equal rights, knows no superior, and which reaches, and is systematically combined with affiliated bodies at the seats of government of the great States—a body that already constitutes a power greater than the power of the provisions of the Constitution, and assuming the right to nominate the President of the United States, expects, by the assistance and increase of their distant associates, and the discipline and popularity of their leaders, to elect the President, in violation of the manner prescribed and established by the Constitution.

The central power at the Seat of Government is at present composed of a select number of the members of Congress, who, from their official station, have access to, and intercourse with, the foreign ambassadors, as likewise with the great officers of the Government, and, by aid of the Post Office, and the public press, communicate with their associates throughout the country. Such a body are capable of having, and actually do possess, great influence in every part of the Union. They are under no restrictions as to the number and condition or residence of their members; the Judges of the Supreme Court, should they consent, may be added to this central junto, an addition which would increase their respectability and influence; they might proceed further, and the Heads of the Executive Departments might be requested to become members of the central junto; should they also unite with them, their influence would be still further increased. Should perilous times occur, and men of unchastened ambition become the President and Vice President of the United States, they would employ this central power to fill the two Houses of Congress with their favorites, and, by their co-operation with the Governors and popular clubs at the seats of the State Governments, be able to effect in our own free country changes which might utterly subvert our beautiful scheme of government. Should this central power, extending to all portions of the Union, be able, by the co-operation of its associates, to discredit and supersede the separate powers of the States in the choice of President, it would afterwards find less difficulty in effecting the consolidation of the Executive power of the United States, which, by the Constitution, proceeds from, rests upon, and is bound to defend, the separate authority of the respective States. This done, the reform will not stop at the consolidation of the Executive power of the United States, ruinous as that measure may prove; but will extend to the legislative department, and, difficult as the attempt may seem, endeavor to abolish the equality of the States in the Senate. This alteration may, in the commencement, be a mere recommendation, like the congé d'élire or nomination of the President by the central power at the Seat of Government; but, recommendations often repeated, will, in time, become imperative commands, and to this end it will be urged that, by these means, our plan of Government will become more economical, more simple, more magnificent, and less liable to change from occasional popular excitement. We may have one Chief Magistrate, instead of twenty-five—one legislature of three hundred members, instead of twenty-five legislatures of three or four thousand members—one judiciary, instead of a thousand, supported by lawyers, whose numbers would form an army—and instead of an irregular choice of the President by the present mode, we may have one unbroken succession of Presidents, from a consistent and perpetual body, whose plans of policy and pretensions to power had been settled by uninterrupted and secret deliberations.

These changes may not occur, and our best security that they will not, depends upon the patient, firm, and constant adherence to the provisions of the Constitution. The compact between the States has already received the sanction of one generation; the alteration which it suffered, during this period, may, perhaps, by common consent, hereafter be itself altered, and the Constitution restored to its primitive form; the changes which happened in the government of Holland, in the Italian Republics, and the progressive steps by which elective magistrates have elsewhere become hereditary, should induce us to adhere with decision and fidelity to the checks and securities which our Constitution has provided for the preservation of our representative system of government, balanced as it is by the division of power between States, unequal in territory, numbers, and wealth, and between them and the United States.

The successive attempts to alter the Constitution, originating in most instances in the belief that the proposed amendments would be positive improvements, although they have failed, have, nevertheless, not only disturbed the repose of Congress, but weakened the stability of the Constitution.

While the subject was under debate in the General and State conventions, every article and provision thereof was open to free examination. In those discussions difficult questions arose upon the division of the powers between the States, and between them and the United States; and particularly in determining the manner in which the powers of the last should be exercised. On this subject, the journals of the General Convention show that the deputies from the great States desired an influence proportionate to their greater numbers and resources; while those from the small States showed an equal or greater solicitude to preserve, as far as possible, the influence of equal sovereigns, which they enjoyed under the Confederation, and in fact possessed in the formation of the Constitution itself. The Constitution, therefore, ought to be regarded as a compact expressive of the liberality and prudent policy of the States, and its apparent inequalities constitute a peculiar system of balances, derived from permanent natural differences among the States, which is believed to be superior to any artificial establishment, or political charter, heretofore devised. The unceasing struggle between the natural superiority of the great States, and the self-love and spirit of equality of the small States, (which will endure so long as their freedom shall exist) constitutes an equipoise of unceasing efficacy in the maintenance and the preservation of our political system. This system is able to maintain and preserve our envied freedom, if it fortunately has influence sufficient to create in the hearts of the citizens of the United States that affection and fidelity without which no plans of freedom ever have succeeded, or can succeed.

It is demanded that any member of the Senate would point out an article or clause of the Constitution which authorizes, or gives the slightest encouragement to, measures of any sort, by which a concentration of the votes for the President may be effected, previously to the choice of Electors in the several States. If no such authority can be shown, and Mr. K. said that, in his opinion, none could be pointed out, it may be fairly inferred, from the provisions of the Constitution, and the power of Congress to give effect to those provisions, respecting the times of appointing the Electors, the time, manner, and places where they must assemble and give their votes, within their respective States, not only that no such authority exists, but the precise and definite regulations which restrict and confine, within the respective States, the initiatory process in the election of the President, exclude every other and different manner of beginning the election, and, connected with the prohibition of members of Congress and persons holding offices under the United States from becoming Electors, demonstrate the illegality and dangerous tendency of a central power, at the Seat of the General Government, combining to nominate the President of the United States eight months before his election. Members of Congress belonging to this central power, and moreover possessing great talents, learning, and experience, will obtain an influence with the Executive departments which must impair the just influence of others, not possessing the same authority. With these discriminations, such members, received with distinction by foreign ambassadors, and necessarily holding, under circumstances of favor, intercourse with the chief officers of the Government, will form connexions, and establish regular intercourse with persons of like talents and learning in the several States, and, in a special manner, at the seats of government of the principal States—these distinguished men becoming the illuminati of our country, and being regulated by a sort of freemasonry, the sign and pass-word of which will, at once, place the initiated in full confidence and communion with each other in all parts of the Union. Such combinations secure to the members of the central power influence and advantages in the making laws, as well as in the procuring of appointments of every sort, and above all, in promoting the election of such candidate for the Presidency as they may select and nominate. The members of the central power will, under such circumstances, devote more of their time, during the sessions immediately preceding an election, in arranging, combining, and extending the means to effect the election of their candidate than will be bestowed on the ordinary and regular business of Congress; and, instead of doing the business that they were deputed to perform, they will be engaged in other duties which interfere with them.

The course of events, during the last Winter, may have already led near observers to suspect a connexion existing between a central power of this description, at the Seat of the General Government, and the Legislatures of Georgia, North Carolina, Virginia, and New York, and perhaps of other States.

It is supposing men to be blind to the influence and results of former examples of this nature, that have appeared in other times and countries, to believe that individuals, distinguished by talents and experience, aided by skilful associates, especially at the seats of the State governments, will be easily defeated, or be likely to fail in the accomplishment of their purpose.

Rome, in former times, was the seat of a great central power, which reached to her remotest provinces, and the life, liberty, and property of the citizens were everywhere held at the mercy of this power. Paris, in our own time, has also been the seat of a great central power, which extended over all parts of France, and, acting upon the people in all their towns and villages, punished opposition to its mandates, and whatsoever were deemed errors in political opinion, with confiscation of property, and loss of life.

These remarks are not to be answered by a reference to the practice of the State Legislatures. Conferences and meetings among the members of those local bodies, to agree upon measures in reference to State policy, are not liable to the same objections. Their influence is less powerful, and they operate within more limited spheres, and the members are more responsible for their political acts, as well by the greater frequency of State elections, as by the scene of their political operations being nearer to the supervision and inspection of their constituents. Neither are there the same Constitutional objections arising from the inequalities of the States and from our federative and balanced system of Government.

It was to protect the people of the States from this great central power that, instead of concentrating power in one place, the Constitution has provided for the division and distribution of it throughout and among the States. By adhering to this division and distribution of power, though we find our Government less simple, more expensive, and less magnificent, we may rationally hope to preserve our political integrity, and to perpetuate our liberties.

There are apparent defects in our Constitution. We have, nevertheless, increased and prospered under it. If these defects were cured, the very means which should effect the cure may introduce, as has happened, other and greater defects, especially when these alterations are made in the midst of political excitement, and without opportunity of regarding all the evils connected with the remedial amendments.

All that is the work of man is, like him, imperfect. We probably enjoy a greater portion of freedom and happiness than falls to the lot of other nations; and because we desire yet more, we must be careful not to lose what we have, by hasty and partial alterations in our plan of Government. He would, therefore, prefer to adhere, for the present, to the Constitution as it is, in hopes that adequate means may be devised to suppress this great and alarming central power, which is now oppressing the Constitution itself, by controlling and superseding its wise and well considered provisions.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was in favor of some amendment of the Constitution, in order to establish an uniform mode of electing the President; and the resolution now before the Senate would only go to produce that effect. He considered it to be the true meaning and intent of the Constitution that the election should be made in some uniform mode, throughout the States, and, if it were so, the choice would not frequently come to the House of Representatives. If the present provisions of the Constitution were suffered to remain, he did not see how we could ever have a President and Vice President elected by the people. Such an event would be morally impossible. He believed it was in the spirit of the Constitution that the President should be elected by the people of the United States. Now, if an amendment was proposed, which would increase the probability of an election according to the true spirit of that instrument, why should it not be adopted? In those States in which the choice of Electors is made by the Legislature, there have been repeated propositions to change the mode of election, or the spur of the occasion, to favor the views of particular candidates. Changes of this kind, Mr. S. believed, had been proposed in Virginia, and in New York, in order to affect their elections. In New York, the members of the Legislature had been subjected to scorn and contempt, for not altering the mode of choosing Electors, to meet a certain exigency. Mr. S. said, if he had been a member of that body, he certainly should not have voted for such a change, under such circumstances. He thought the mode of election, whatever it might be, ought to be uniform in each State, and throughout the country.

The resolution proposed by the gentleman from Missouri had been taken up, and partly discussed—and, Mr. S. said, he did not know why it should not be further considered. He had never listened with more pleasure than to the arguments of that gentleman in support of the plan he had proposed; and, as other members had intimated their wish to reply to those arguments, Mr. S. was willing they should have the opportunity to do so. When the speech of the member from Missouri came to be printed, as it probably would be, and as it richly deserved to be, he wished to see the arguments of those who were opposed to that gentleman's plan also printed—that the public might see and judge of the reasons urged in its support. As to the practice of holding caucuses, to which the gentleman from New York had alluded, it had long existed in this country. It was no new thing here. It had been adopted on a great many important occasions—it had produced a great many good effects. Mr. S. believed the first embargo was agreed upon in caucus. Every one had a right to the exercise of his own opinions and principles, on that subject. But, Mr. S. said, he considered the present question to be upon the propriety of establishing some uniform mode of electing the President; and this, he thought, ought to be done.

Mr. VAN BUREN, of New York, said, that it had not been his intention to add any thing to the remarks he had heretofore submitted on the motion now under consideration, but some explanation on his part had become necessary. It would, he thought, be injustice, as well to his constituents as to himself, to suffer the new views which had been taken of the subject by his honorable colleague, to pass unnoticed. In discharging the duty thus imposed upon him, he would not increase the excitement which has been manifested, by giving any latitude to the discussion which the occasion did not call for. No portion of the time of the Senate would be occupied by him, in discussing the constitutionality of a Congressional caucus; nor in considering any of those nice distinctions which challenged respect for the proceedings of conventions of one description, and denied it to others; nor in detecting those still more subtle refinements which regarded meetings of the same character as sometimes proper, and others destructive of the purity of elections and dangerous to the liberties of the people. He could not satisfy himself that this was either the place or the occasion for discussions of that character. But, whilst he abstained from following his colleague in the remarks having reference to this subject, which he had allowed himself to make, Mr. V. B. hoped he would not be understood as wishing to raise a question as to the propriety of the course which his colleague thought proper to pursue. It would not become him to do so. The principal ground taken for the postponement of the resolution, on a former occasion, related to the excitement produced by the approaching election, and the superior fitness of a future period for the consideration of the subject. This ground had now been much enlarged. It had been observed by an honorable member from North Carolina, in opposition to the motion, that the necessity of some amendment of the Constitution, in this respect, was generally admitted, and had been extensively called for by the people. Mr. V. B. understood his colleague not only to deny the fact alleged, as to the state of public opinion, but to contest the propriety of any amendment of the Constitution on the subject of the choice of President and Vice President. It was on those two points he would make a few remarks.

It could not, he thought, be necessary, and might not be proper, to detain the Senate by a minute statement of the various proceedings of Congress, and of the States, on the subject. A very brief reference to them would show that the gentleman from North Carolina was supported by facts in the opinion he had expressed. Mr. V. B. believed that, on examination, it would be found that the first movement on the subject had been made by the State he had the honor, in part, to represent. It was now twenty-two years since the Legislature of New York, shortly after an election, and under circumstances entirely disconnecting the measure with any pending controversy, had, with great unanimity, passed resolutions in favor of an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, requiring the division of the respective States into districts for the choice of Electors, and authorizing their selection immediately by the people. Those resolutions were communicated to Congress, and would be found on the journals of the Senate; since that time the subject had been acted upon, at various periods, and in different forms, as well by Congress as the Legislatures of the different States. Of the proceedings of the latter, those of North Carolina and New Jersey have been most conspicuous. The Legislature of North Carolina passed resolutions, nearly similar to those of New York, and sent them to the different States for concurrence. New York instructed her Senators, and requested her Representatives, to endeavor to obtain the amendment proposed by North Carolina, and many of the States gave similar instructions. At least three times within eleven years, and as late as the year 1822, resolutions, proposing amendments to the Constitution upon the subject of the election of President and Vice President, have passed this body, by more than the Constitutional majority, and there had been few sessions for several years, in which the subject had not been more or less acted upon. Early in the present session resolutions for amendment had been proposed by Senators from Missouri, New Jersey, South Carolina, Massachusetts, and New York.

Amendments to the Constitution.

SENATE.

Their respective propositions had been referred to a committee, combining much of the talent and experience of the Senate, of which his colleague was a member. The subject had been considered with great care, and a plan reported, containing, as the committee thought, the best parts of the resolutions referred to them. In that report, he understood the committee were unanimous, and appearances certainly indicated the adoption of some resolution on the subject at the present session. Such were his impressions, and he thought that such had been the opinions of the members of the Senate generally. In view of the facts he had stated, he could neither repress nor conceal his disappointment in finding the motion for postponement now supported on the ground that no amendment was desired by the people.

Mr. V. B. said that, although the resolution he had proposed had not been wholly adopted by the committee, and notwithstanding he desired material alterations of that reported, still, if he should be unsuccessful in his endeavors to obtain the alteration he wished, he would cheerfully vote for the amendment reported by the committee. He considered it to be far preferable, for all concerned, to the existing provisions of the Constitution. It would be unwise, he thought, to examine the merits of the various plans proposed, before the Senate decided on the present motion. He was unwilling to occupy the time of the Senate in discussions, which might be rendered worse than useless, by the postponement of the subject; but his honorable colleague had taken one view of the question, which rendered a brief reply indispensable. If Mr. V. B. had correctly understood his colleague, he had spoken of the proposed amendment, as an attempt, on the part of the large States, to deprive the smaller States, in the Confederacy, of their equal votes, in the House of Representatives, in the choice of President, on the ground of its being a usurpation which ought to be repressed; and, thus considering the subject, he had enlarged on the circumstances under which this right was conceded to the small States, and had spoken of the great danger to which they were exposed, from the possible combination between the States of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York. Mr. V. B. thought it due to his constituents, from their relation to the question in that form, and to himself, also, as having introduced one of the resolutions, to disclaim, for both, any views of the character alluded to. A reference to what had taken place here, ought to dispel the erroneous impression which had been made on the mind of his colleague. The first proposition for the amendment of the Constitution, in this respect, offered at this session, came from Missouri, the youngest, and, except one, or perhaps two, the smallest State in the Confederacy; and the others, from New Jersey, South Carolina, Massachusetts, and New York, in the order in which he had named these States. The propositions from New Jersey and South Carolina yielded the principle of giving to each State an equal vote, on receiving what they regarded as an equivalent. That equivalent consisted in the division of the large States into districts, to which, by the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina, was added the proposition, which could not but prove conservative of the interest of all, the removal of the decision from the House of Representatives. The principal difference between the plan he had the honor to propose, and those of which he had last spoken, was, that, instead of providing for the ultimate decision of the question by the House of Representatives, as was done in that of the gentleman from New Jersey, he proposed a second reference to the Electors; and, instead of sending it back as often as might be necessary to a choice, as proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. V. B.'s plan compelled a choice on the second ballot by the Electors; a majority of the committee, to which the several propositions had been referred, were from small States, and they had agreed on an amendment, founded on principles of reciprocal concessions for the general good. This was all that the Representatives of the large States had, as he understood them, contended for. They could not, ought not, did not, desire that the small States should surrender any portion of the power and influence now secured to them by the Constitution, unless these States should, themselves, think, that their own condition would be improved, and the general welfare promoted, by their doing so, on receiving concessions, fully equivalent, from the large States. Considerations of such liberal and equitable character had been held out on both sides, and the conflicting interests of the different States, on this point, arising from their unfortunate inequality, had hitherto, to the honor of the Senate, been commented upon without the least acrimony, and under the control of feelings which promised the most auspicious results. Mr. V. B. said that nothing had taken place to change his views or disposition on the subject. He was anxious to continue the discussion, and was willing to lend his feeble efforts to obtain the adoption of some resolution, on the subject, at this session. To this end, he was ready, on the part of his constituents, to make all reasonable sacrifices. If, however, gentlemen thought that the next session would be a more propitious period, and the character of the debate, on this motion, certainly afforded some reason to believe that it might be so, he would bow, respectfully, to the will of the majority. Until, however, that was expressed, he would continue to oppose the postponement.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, said: The Convention who formed our Constitution could not have foreseen all the effects of its operation—powers have resulted from it that were not anticipated—the relative strength of the States has undergone a change, which has disturbed the checks and balances of the Constitution. The honorable gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) has shown the evils of the present system of electing a President, and the necessity of districting the States for that purpose, in the strongest point of view. The election of a President by the people at large would be a preferable mode, if it were practicable; but, whoever will look at the situation of our country, with its different kinds of population; different modes of election; different qualifications of voters, must at once perceive that such an election is utterly impracticable. The choosing of the Presidential Electors, in single districts, is the nearest possible approach to an election by the people at large.

A disproportion has grown out of the relative powers of the great and small States, which the members of the Convention could not have foreseen, and which has given a new character to our system.

In an election by Electors, six great States can control the election; and leave eighteen States without power or influence upon the question. In the House of Representatives, thirteen small States, with forty-five Representatives, can elect a President against the residue of the States, with one hundred and sixty-eight Representatives. Why should the great States be all-powerful in the first case, and the small States in the latter. The gentleman from New York (Mr. KING) is willing to put the small States on an equality with the large. Is he so? This is very strange. But it is only on choosing a President in the House of Representatives, which can rarely occur. But, is he willing to give this equality of vote, on the first election of a President, which must occur every four years? No. New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Ohio, have 133 Electors, and can control the election of a President—bare majorities, in each of these States, can control the Union, upon this question. These States are of contiguous territory, and may easily have a community of interest that shall bind them together, at least upon one question. The gentleman from Missouri says, that the power exercised by the Legislatures of the States, to appoint Electors, is a usurpation—that it ought to be relinquished, without any concession of power on the part of the small States. Call this power by what name you please, it is now a permanent power; only to be reached by an amendment of the Constitution. However incorrect the construction of the Constitution might have been, and was, when this power was first assumed, it has been acquiesced in for more than thirty years. To reject the electoral votes thus given, at this time, would be to dissolve the Union. It is too late to oppose the exercise of this power. But the power, on the part of the States, to choose their Electors by general ticket is not denied; and yet its effect is precisely the same: it gives the great States precisely the same power to control the election of a President. So far as regards the citizens of the large States where it may be adopted, it is equally oppressive to the minorities, and less calculated to give a fair expression of the will of the majorities. In the State of New York, for instance, with a population of a million and a half, and a territory of forty-six thousand square miles, thirty-six Electors are to be chosen by general ticket; they must be selected from the different districts of the State—any other arrangement could not succeed. The voters, generally speaking, would not know, even by name, more than one or two of the Electors to be voted for; for all the rest, they must vote upon trust.

The voter follows the great man of his town—he the great man of the county—and he some three or four great men of the State; who thus wield the force of a million and a half of people.

If the Legislature choose the Electors, they have the opportunity of knowing whom they choose; they are the agents in whom their constituents confide; they, at least, afford a connecting link of information between the people and the Electors to be chosen.

Will the large States give up this power, without a corresponding concession on the part of the small States? They will not. They are strong, sturdy, and obstinate. They have been urged upon this point for twenty years, but without effect—further efforts are hopeless. What is the power of the small States, which it is the wish of the great States to restrain or modify?

On an election of President, in the House of Representatives, thirty-one members from thirteen small States can control the election. Is this a safe power, even to the small States themselves? Should they exercise their power to the full extent, the first attempt would probably be fatal to their independence. Can they feel a confidence that they would exercise their power with discretion? In the moment of party excitement, when ambition, and all the fierce passions of anger and excitement, have their sway, discretion is lost sight of. The power is a dangerous one—much more dangerous to the small States than to the large. The danger of dissolving our Union would create, comparatively, but little alarm in New York. What has she to fear? She is an empire in herself. But, with New Jersey, the case is altogether different. Without the Constitution, she must cease to be an independent State. Situated between two potent neighbors, of whose disposition to oppress she had sufficient evidence, between the close of the Revolutionary war and the formation of our present Constitution, she would be crushed. On the dissolution of the Union, real property, in New Jersey, would instantly fall fifty per cent. The State is so situated, that a large portion of her commerce must necessarily go through the ports of New York and Pennsylvania. The duties on foreign goods consumed in New Jersey, would be paid in New York and Pennsylvania; and pass into the treasuries of those States. New Jersey would be tributary to them. She would resist, and, probably, make the City of Jersey, Perth Amboy, and Burlington, free ports of entry. This would destroy her whole system of protecting the industry of the State, and would lead to acts of retaliation on the part of those States in which her prosperity would be utterly destroyed. New Jersey has a stronger interest in the Constitution than any other State in the Union.

It is for this reason, that, in that State, there is the strongest disposition to provide for the permanency of the Constitution, by correcting the abuses that have grown up under it—more especially the disproportion of the power of the great and small States in choosing the Chief Magistrate, and the difficulty of such a choice in the House of Representatives.

How the fears of the gentleman from New York have been allayed, within a few weeks, I know not; while the dangers themselves have evidently increased.

The dangers of choosing the President, in 1801, were such as to threaten us with dissolution of our compact. But, the difficulties now to be contended with, in such an election, would be made much greater. Then, there were but two candidates; the first ballot would have resulted in a choice, if some States had not been divided. Now, there must be three candidates. The House of Representatives will be divided between the three; even the Representatives of the States may be divided between the three. The confusion might become inextricable.

Suppose New York were to give 12 votes to A, 11 to B, and 11 to C, would this insure the vote of New York for A? The friends of B and C would say not. Should a plurality or majority govern in such a case? Should the State say what was its vote? or should the House of Representatives prescribe the rule? The case is full of difficulty and danger.

This amendment, Mr. D. said, if it should be agreed to by the requisite number of both Houses of Congress, must be submitted to the several States; and, unless three-fourths of them were in favor of it, it could not be adopted. The large and the small States must all be consulted, and he well knew it would be very difficult to get any amendment adopted. It is said that it will take away the rights of the States. But, unless they agree to it, the proposition can never take effect. Mr. D. thought the present provision of the Constitution, in respect to the election of President, was extremely weak. He was fully convinced that it was the unanimous opinion of the old States, that some alteration ought to take place; they have earnestly looked for it; they ask it at our hands. Both the small and the large States will consent to give up something for the sake of effecting that object. Neither of them would be willing to do it, unless an equivalent was obtained. Mr. D. feared that the present was not the time to act upon these amendments; he thought it would be necessary to test the Constitution, as it now stands, a little longer. It would take a long time to get any amendment through, and it was thought that the present was not a fit time for the discussion, in consequence of the excitement which prevails throughout the country in regard to the ensuing election. The gentleman from New York has changed his mind respecting the propriety of amending the Constitution.

Mr. KING, of New York, rose to explain, in reference to the change of opinion imputed to him by the gentleman from New Jersey. We understood him to say, that, although he had formerly been favorable to some amendment of the Constitution, in regard to the election of President, yet his attention had been most powerfully attracted by a power which had since risen up, which appeared to him so terrific that he hardly dared to contemplate the effects it might produce—he meant the power which members of Congress had assumed, of nominating a President of the United States. It was placing the complete control of the Government in the hands of a party. He firmly believed that the power thus assumed would, if permitted to be exercised, eventually overwhelm the Constitution. It would produce a fearful combination of the large States. The small States, he thought, would not consent to go into caucus; if they did, it would be a suicidal act on their part. He called upon gentlemen to produce the smallest authority, in any part of the Constitution, for these meetings. He considered them as violating the spirit of that instrument. The power of choosing the President is given to the Colleges of Electors—the election, in the first instance, is in their hands; and, to prevent the possibility of combination, they are chosen only about thirty days before their office is to be performed. The election is directed to be made in all the different States on the same day, and the Electors are permitted to make but one attempt at a choice. These provisions of the Constitution were adopted for the express purpose of preventing combinations—an effect which, Mr. B. thought, was greatly to be dreaded from the practice of nomination by Congressional caucuses.

Mr. DICKERSON resumed. He intended no disrespect to the honorable member from New York in imputing to him a change of opinion on this subject. In regard to the caucus which had been spoken of in this discussion, Mr. D. said, he conceived it was neither forbidden nor enjoined by the Constitution. He considered it as a perfectly harmless expression of the opinion of those who attended it. Members of Congress had certainly as good a right, in their individual capacities, to recommend a candidate for the Presidency, as any other men. Similar meetings have been held in every State, every county, and almost every town in the country. The same privilege of recommending candidates is exercised by every printer in the country. Some of them have recommended three or four different candidates within the last six or eight months. No mischief can result from the caucus nomination—it imposes upon nobody; it binds nobody; it will go for what it is worth, and no more—it is the mere exercise of opinion, and that is a right which, whether it respected men or measures, Mr. D. said, he would never relinquish. It is a right guaranteed by the Constitution and the laws of the country, and one which will be exercised.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, next rose. It is to me, said Mr. H., matter of regret and astonishment, that this debate should have taken such a turn. I had the honor to be, with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) on the committee to whom these amendments to the Constitution were referred. I had, till then, some doubts whether, at this time, it was proper to act upon them. But I then had the countenance and support of that honorable gentleman. Full well I knew and appreciated his experience and wisdom. As he was one of those who framed that instrument, and knew the views and motives of his associates, I adopted him, in some measure, as my Mentor. The amendment which has been the subject of his animadversion, was agreed on in committee, with great unanimity; and by none with more cordiality and zeal than by that gentleman. But though he has seen fit to change his opinion, I have not. However I may respect him, I cannot consent to be led about in this way. For the reasons which he has deemed proper to offer to the Senate, I, as one, feel mortified and humbled. Never before, except once, and that by the same honorable member, has the election, which now agitates the public, been introduced into our deliberations. This Senate should be, and, until now, thank God, it has been, above popular excitement. And from what source does it come? Who sets the pernicious example? One whose age and experience point him out as a model.

Sir, I assure that honorable gentleman that I have no need of his advice, nor will I submit to the dictation of any Senator here, to direct me in my private or individual conduct. Until I shall be arraigned, as the Constitution prescribes, I shall not condescend to account to any, or all, the members of this Senate, for my acts out of this body, and with which they have no concern.

The first use of the word "caucus" here, in debate, I regret to say, was from that gentleman. He has been pleased to arraign before the Senate certain members of this, and the other House, because they saw fit to meet and recommend a candidate to the people, for President of the United States. And, by this act, he affects to believe that the Constitution has been so violated that he would not amend it at all. Sir, pardon me when I say that this is an idle dream.

He seems to apprehend that the time will come when the President and Heads of Departments will participate in such a convention. Sir, there is no danger of that. When the members of the Executive Department shall combine to appoint a successor for the President, the people will put down the combination. No, sir; when these gentlemen attempt this, it will not be by a public meeting. Secret engines will be put in operation—private agents will be employed, and means will be used which shun the light.

A public meeting has been held to recommend to the people to unite, and keep the election in their own hands. At this, the honorable gentleman takes umbrage and alarm—he condemns this measure of union; and avows his wishes that the election may be made by the House of Representatives. He seems to think, that any meeting, or any exertions of individuals to prevent it, is to defeat the provisions of the Constitution! This, from a representative of the largest State in the Union, is very frank, and very disinterested. Sir, it would be humiliating to give the proper answer to all this—a regard to the dignity of the Senate forbids the just retort. But we may be allowed to say, that, when the Representatives act with open doors, and expose their views and motives to the world, the people's rights are safe, the danger lies in secret combinations, in compacts to divide and distract—in private meetings to prevent public meetings.

It is here that bargains may be made, and management and intrigue be practised with success. I, sir, am proud in the reflection, that we have acted openly and above-board. We have united, as individuals, to recommend a candidate to the people. I hold myself accountable, for this to no member of this Senate, however respectable. For this act, I am responsible only to my conscience, my country, and my God.

It is a source of consolation and confidence, that this course has been sanctioned by constant usage, and the approbation and support of the most distinguished patriots and statesmen. And, in what instance have the rights of the people been infringed, their liberties impaired, or the Constitution violated? Do you perceive it in the prosperity, happiness, and independence, which every where surround you?

Sir, the people of the United States are high-minded, independent, and intelligent Republicans. They understand their own rights, and, I trust, know how to preserve them. If they see cause, they will disregard, and disapprove, our recommendation. When, in my opinion, I need it, I will consent to be advised, and even catechised, by any Senator; and by none sooner than the honorable member from New York. But, of this, I must take the liberty of being my own judge. Upon my individual conduct, beyond these walls, I will not be compelled to submit to any tribunal other than those which I have named. I need not add, I am of age to act for myself.

Mr. LOWRIE, of Pennsylvania, said, it was with a sensation of pain, that he observed the situation in which the Senate was, at this moment, placed. Instead of considering, with calm deliberation, the amendments to the Constitution, submitted by the different members, and especially the one which had received the sanction of the committee of the body, the Senate is involved, by the remarks of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) in the discussion of the propriety of a Congressional caucus. Sir, said Mr. L., the gentleman has expressed himself, in strong terms, against this measure; and, if he has not alarmed others, he has shown that he is himself alarmed at the results which are likely to follow. But, sir, I for one, will not be forced into a discussion of this measure, on the floor of the Senate. Notwithstanding the great respect I have for the gentleman from New York, so improper do I consider his remarks, that, on this point, I will not even answer him. But, although I choose to be silent, I beg the gentleman to be assured that it is not because I see any thing new or formidable in his remarks, or any thing difficult to answer.

What is the question, said Mr. L., which, at this time is, or ought to be, before the Senate? A motion for indefinite postponement of the various amendments offered to the Constitution of the United States. Five years ago, when I first took my seat here, the gentleman from New Jersey, instructed by the State which he represents, offered an amendment embracing the district system. It passed the Senate by the Constitutional majority. It passed then, and it has passed since, without the aid of my vote. As a Representative from a large State, I never have consented to a system which went to strike out of existence the lines of the States. Such is the effect of the district system that, instead of States, you are to have districts. Sir, I will not consent to a system which would prevent the State of Pennsylvania from speaking, on this question, with her whole strength entire and unbroken, unless the small States will give an equivalent. We have been told of the advantages of the district system; and that there are advantages in it I admit. But these advantages, heretofore, have been asked for by concessions from the large States only. The question has, this session, for the first time, assumed a new form. A proposition is submitted by which the large and the small States can meet on middle ground. I have been anxious to hear this proposition discussed by the Senate. My wish has been that the attention of our constituents should be drawn to it. Should a majority of the Senate be against it, there is still remaining the amendment submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE.) With some modification that amendment would be my second choice; both are of grave and solemn import—they require at your hands a full, a calm, and deliberate discussion. Why is the motion for indefinite postponement thrown in the way? Because, it is said, an election of President takes place next Fall, and there is great excitement in the country on that question. Sir, it is admitted by all, that no amendment we can now propose will affect the next election; and, this being the case, what connexion can the present question have with the ensuing election, more than any other subject presented for our deliberation? There is, in reality, no sound reason why we should not proceed. Nothing but the influence of undue excitement could have induced the gentleman from New York to bring the propriety or constitutionality of a Congressional caucus into this debate. No excitement showed itself within these walls, until that gentleman indulged himself in the remarks we have just heard. The perplexed view which the gentleman has given of our political situation, is, in my judgment, no reason why the present question should be arrested. Mr. L. said he would vote against the postponement; but, if other gentlemen thought the next session would be more favorable for a decision of the question, he would acquiesce; but, at the next session, if no other gentleman brought the subject forward, he would then present it to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. NOBLE, of Indiana, said this debate had certainly assumed a very strange and unexpected course; but, if the object in giving it this direction was to affect the public mind, in relation to the caucus which had been recently held, he trusted that object would be defeated. He had attended that caucus himself—and he certainly should not ask pardon of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) or of any other member in the Senate, for having done so; further than the rules of respect towards members, and the decorum usually observed in the Senate. The object of the caucus was to produce union; it did not infringe upon the free vote of any citizen of the United States, nor of the State to which he belonged. He adverted to the political operations of the Government previous, and at the day of, Jefferson's nomination. It was by caucus that the power then in the hands of Federalists was dislodged, and, from his youthful days, he said amen! and so he said now. In New York, he said, if he had rightly been informed, some years ago, upon a certain occasion, in electing a Senator from that State to the United States, the election was delayed, and an union formed between the Federalists and Clintonians, in order to suit certain individuals, and to answer individual purposes. What was this but a caucus? No one ever believed that the people of the great State of New York was contaminated by the union of those parties. But, he asked, what had this to do with the propositions to amend the Constitution of the United States now under consideration? It was a departure from the subject, and a firebrand thrown into the House. This central power, to which the member from New York alludes, and his fears that the Constitution would be destroyed, he presumed was intended to produce some effect in New York. He liked consistency in gentlemen who stepped forward to protect the rights of the people—the gentleman himself denied the other day that the people were the constitutional sovereigns in this Government—he contended that the States were the sovereigns, when it was known to all Republicans that the people were the source of all power, and constituted the division of all powers, whether applied to the State Governments or the Federal. Mr. N. said he would not suffer himself to be traduced by any member for having gone into caucus, without defending himself. What was done there, was done openly—it was the mere expression of private sentiment—such a practice was in existence, he believed, in every State—in every county—and in every township in the United States, in relation to the election of all officers, either of the State or Federal Government, and never considered as violating the Constitution of the United States, except by those whose favorites could not prevail, nor yet as constituting "this central power." On this question, Mr. N. said, that he did not expect to be called upon to defend the caucus, the doings of that meeting were public, they were gone out to the people. But pray let the gentleman from New York tell us what has been done on the other side—he meant the anti-caucus—and see whether their proceedings formed any part of this "central power," so dangerous to the liberties of the people. Let him say what part of the Constitution gave this right. Mr. N. said he did not condemn the course, for it was but a caucus to know whether they would go into a caucus, this was but private sentiment, and the only difference between the caucus and anti-caucus is, the former was a private sentiment expressed with previous notice; and the latter, private sentiment, without notice.

Mr. KING, of New York, said that, in the few remarks he had made to the Senate, he had intended no disrespect towards any member. He had thought that, in the present situation of the country, this was not the proper time for the consideration of amendments to the Constitution. The subject had interwoven itself into the affairs of his own State, in regard to the Presidential election. He trusted he was not precluded from expressing his opinion on a subject of great importance and notoriety. In considering amendments to the Constitution, he had thought it not improper to mention the exercise of a power which was not authorized by the Constitution. That power was one, the operation of which, he believed, was much to be dreaded; and surely there was no impropriety in alluding to it. If things were doing in the country, which were thought improper, and which had a bearing on the subject under discussion, would the Senate not be influenced by them?

Mr. FINDLAY said that, as this was a most unpleasant discussion, more so than he had ever heard since he had the honor of a seat in the Senate, he would endeavor to terminate it. He moved an adjournment. The motion was carried, and the Senate adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, March 19.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of W. Rawle, President of the Pennsylvania Society for promoting the abolition of slavery, praying that provision may be made by law for the total abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia; which was read, and on motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, laid on the table.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of William Tilghman, President of the Board of Managers of the Pennsylvania Society for the encouragement of American manufactures, requesting that such a system may be digested as will secure to manufactures a portion of that protection which has been extended to commerce and tobacco planting. He also presented the memorial of Tobias Huber, and others, of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying an increase of the duties on imports. The memorials were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. WARE presented the preamble and resolutions, adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Burke county, in Georgia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill pending in Congress to increase the duties on imports; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill to provide for the security of public money in the hands of clerks of courts, attorneys, and marshals, and their deputies, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to enable the President to carry into effect the treaty made at Ghent, the 24th December, 1814, excluding foreigners from trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States, and to preserve the fur trade within the said United States, to American citizens, and the bill for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner, were severally read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, on the petition of Thomas Evans and Thomas Coppuck, and the memorial of William F. Chesley, and others; and, on motion, it was laid on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of the several resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, in relation to the election of President and Vice President, was resumed. Mr. LANMAN was called to the chair. The question was, upon Mr. MILLS's motion, to postpone the subject indefinitely.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, said, that his only object in calling up these resolutions was to obtain some decision on them. The Senate had, for several months, had the subject before them, and it was due no less to the public than to the gentlemen who had submitted the propositions, that they should now be acted on definitively. Mr. HAYNE protested that he had not anticipated the course which the debate had taken, and he most sincerely regretted that certain topics had been introduced into the discussion, which were unfortunately but too well calculated to produce a painful excitement. As these topics, however, had been discussed, it would become his duty, in the course of the observations he was about to make, to notice them. The cause of truth demanded that arguments calculated to influence public opinion, (though founded, as he believed, in error,) should not go forth to the world unanswered. He would, in the first place, however, make a few remarks on the questions properly before the Senate. There are two propositions, said Mr. H. now under consideration. The first is, the proposition reported by the committee to which the honorable gentleman from New Jersey was chairman, which proposes so to amend the Constitution as to divide the whole of the United States into districts, for the choice of Electors for President and Vice President, and on the failure to make a choice at the first ballot, that the election should devolve on the Senate and House of Representatives in joint ballot. The second proposition, now under consideration, is the amendment submitted by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, which differs from the former, in proposing to dispense entirely with Electors, retaining, however, that provision of the Constitution which directs a choice by the House of Representatives, (voting by States,) in the event of a failure of the election by the people. A motion has now been made to postpone these resolutions indefinitely. Mr. H. confessed that, though he was decidedly opposed to both of them, yet, if he had any hope that the Senate would act on them during the present session, so far as to enable the other gentlemen who had submitted propositions, to bring them forward, with any prospect of a favorable hearing and final decision, he would vote against the postponement. He had ascertained, however, that a majority of the Senate did not deem it expedient to adopt any amendment to the Constitution during the present session; and opposed, as he always was, to the unnecessary consumption of time by a fruitless discussion, he should vote for the indefinite postponement. He would avail himself of this opportunity to say a few words in reply to what had fallen from gentlemen on the other side, on the merits of the first proposition—that reported by the committee. But, before he proceeded to do so, he would notice some statements made by the honorable gentleman from New York, which Mr. H. conceived to be erroneous. That gentleman (Mr. VAN BUREN) had said, that the resolution under consideration had been agreed to in committee unanimously. This, Mr. H. said, was a mistake. He had, himself, voted against the resolution, and so had the gentleman from Missouri. The gentleman from New York had also stated, in the course of his argument, that resolutions on this subject had been often reported by committees, and had several times passed the Senate, and he therefore infers that the Senate must be prepared to act upon them now. I am informed, said Mr. H., that one of the features of the proposition, now before us, has never before been introduced into this House, and assuredly has never received, and he trusted never would receive, its deliberate sanction. He alluded to that part of the resolution which proposes to substitute a vote by the joint ballot of the Senate and House of Representatives, for the present mode of voting in the House of Representatives by States. The gentleman from New York had fallen into another error, which he would take the liberty also to correct. He had considered the proposed amendments to the Constitution, as originating in the dissatisfaction of the small States, and he represents the large States as perfectly satisfied with the Constitution as it now stands, but magnanimously disposed to yield to the wishes of the small States, provided they could obtain some reasonable equivalent. This is surely, sir, said Mr. H., a most mistaken view of the subject. One of the propositions, submitted during the present session, came from the gentleman himself, one of the Representatives of the great State of New York, another came from an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts—and, though the gentleman from Missouri comes from a small State, yet he told us, that when he considered her destinies, he brought to the discussion of the subject all the feelings of a Representative from a large State. The gentleman from New York, himself, tells us that almost every member of the House admits that there are defects in the Constitution in respect to the provision for the election of a Chief Magistrate, and that we are all willing to adopt some amendment; he affirms, confidently, that the people in every part of the United States are calling for such an amendment—that they are prepared for, and expect it. These admissions, surely, prove that the proposed amendments have a deeper foundation, than any dissatisfaction on the part of the small States. The truth is, said Mr. H., that not one of the propositions which have been submitted would add a particle to the power of the small States, though he believed that some of them would not impair their strength. Let us, said Mr. H., take higher ground, and be influenced by more generous and liberal views on this subject. Let us look exclusively to the great interests of the nation. Let us consider these propositions in their true character, as coming indiscriminately from large and small States, and having no other object than the welfare of the whole. Mr. H. said, he was willing to admit that the spirit of harmony and mutual concession could alone lead to any desirable results on this subject. It was in that spirit that the Constitution had been framed, and by that alone could its harmonious operation be secured. He should certainly be one of the last to contend that the great principle of compromise, on which the Constitution was founded, and on which the dearest rights, perhaps the existence, of the small States, depended, should ever be forgotten or disregarded. He contended only against jealousies and struggles for political power. Having thus presented the question in what he believed to be its true light, Mr. H. said he would proceed to consider the resolution reported by the committee. On that part of it which proposes to divide the United States into districts for the choice of Electors, he would make but a single remark, as he certainly did not intend on the present motion to enter into a full discussion of the subject. The remark he would make, was, that whatever might be the advantages of the district system, (and he admitted them to be very great,) it certainly lessened the chances of effecting a choice, and indeed would, in most cases, lead to a failure of the election. It surely, said Mr. H., can require no argument to prove that the United States, divided into two parts, each expressing but one opinion, will be less liable to a division of sentiments than when divided into two hundred and sixty such parts. When a State acts as a State, whether the vote be given by the Legislature or by general ticket, there can exist but one opinion—the voice of the State; but the same State, divided into districts, may have as many opinions as there are districts. The merit of the district system, then, depends on the provision by which it may be accompanied, as to the course to be pursued in the event of the failure of the election at the first ballot. He was convinced that this failure would take place under the district system in nine cases out of ten, and, therefore, if it were proposed on such failure to throw the election into the House of Representatives, or into Congress, the substance of the proposition would be to provide for the election of the Chief Magistrate by Congress, and not by the people. If, said Mr. H., the district system was accompanied by a provision, that, on the failure of the election at the first ballot, it should be sent back to the Electors to choose the President from the two highest candidates, then the system would be complete, an election of the people would be secured, and the necessity of any interference on the part of Congress would be taken away. A second ballot by the Electors was the principle, said Mr. H., on which his proposition was founded. It could be ingrafted on the district system, or on any other which did not dispense with Electors. The details of such a system, he was satisfied, could be easily arranged, and he hoped, at some future day, to see it adopted.

But what, said Mr. H., is the substance of the proposition now before us? What will be its practical effect? The people are to pass through the form of voting for a President, in their respective districts, but if no candidate has a majority, (and no one will ever have a majority, except it be in a very extraordinary case,) then the election is to go into Congress—both branches of the Legislature voting by polls, and not by States. I consider, said Mr. H., the whole resolution to contain, substantially, nothing more than a proposition to change the voting in Congress by States to a joint ballot, with the further evil of carrying the election, in almost every instance, into Congress. It results, then, in a proposition to elect the President hereafter by the National Legislature. Now, sir, said Mr. H., I consider such a system as pregnant with dreadful evils. It is true, that it was proposed in the Convention, but mature deliberation led to its abandonment; and when we look into the great commentary on the Constitution, (the Federalist,) we find the weighty reasons stated which induced the Convention to prefer a choice by Electors, to one by Congress.

Can it be necessary, said Mr. H., to point out the evils of choosing a President by the National Legislature? He would state some of them. The occasion and the nature of the question now before the Senate, would not permit him to enlarge. The first objection to the election of a President by the National Legislature, is found in its connecting the Executive with the Legislative department of the Government. It is the theory of our Government, that the several departments should be kept, as far as possible, separate and distinct. If the Legislature shall be authorized to choose the Executive, is it not obvious that they will be rendered mutually dependent on each other? Either the Executive will be rendered the humble tool—the obedient servant of the Legislature—or, what is most to be apprehended, the Legislature will become subservient to the views of the Executive. Judging from the experience of the world, I should say, that a President of the United States, uniformly chosen by the National Legislature, would acquire a most dangerous influence over all their deliberations. With an immense patronage in his hands, a President might be able, by feeding the hopes of greedy expectants, to secure his constant re-election. He would have the means of doing so, and to insure his election would be the motive to exert them. An ambitious aspirant for the Chief Magistracy of this great Republic, might have in his power, by management and intrigue, not only to secure his election, but to mould the Legislature to his will. With so great a prize at stake, no exertions would be wanting to secure it. Promises, threats, intrigue, and corruption, would exhaust their resources, to influence and control the Electoral college. But the higher, as well as the baser motives of human action, would be enlisted in the service. Party spirit, personal and political attachments, would combine to influence the decision of the National Legislature in the choice of a Chief Magistrate. Men, who would rise superior to naked bribery and corruption, would be hurried on by their passions, and even by honorable ambition, to second the views of their favorites. At present Congress is considered as a body who may (in an event not likely to happen) be called upon to elect the President. But if that election was always to be made by Congress—if ambitious men were taught to look to that body, and not to the people, for promotion—who can be so blind as not to perceive that the Hall of Congress would become the arena, where we would witness the most violent and convulsive struggles for power? The very nature of the contest would have a tendency to give to it peculiar energy and bitterness. Such is the character of man, that he is always as much, if not more, devoted to men than to principles. As much as we are accustomed to boast of our exclusive attachment to the latter, principles and men cannot be separated: It is imbodied wisdom that we admire. It is “virtue confessed in human shape,” that we love. It is principle speaking in the life and actions of men, that comes home to the “bosoms and business” of us all. It was this view of the subject, the apprehension of the dreadful excitement which would always prevail in electing a President to Congress—the intrigue it would introduce—the corruption to which it would give birth—the convulsive struggles for power—the destructive influence to which it would subject the Legislature of the country—which induced our fathers to lodge the power of electing a President in the hands of the people. They act, it is true, by their delegates, but the Electors must be chosen a very short time before the day of election, and having performed the single act confided to them, they return immediately to the body of the people—thus avoiding all the dangers which might arise from the employment of a pre-existing body of men, for the same purpose. Sir, said Mr. H., I cannot contemplate without anxiety and alarm, the adoption of a principle in our Constitution, which must, in practice, almost invariably give the choice of the President to Congress. I cannot but foresee that, on all future occasions that great transaction is destined to convulse the country. We have this day before our eyes a solemn warning of the fact. When, at future periods, the number of candidates shall be multiplied—when parties shall be formed in every part of this great empire, each anxious for the triumph and zealous in the support of their favorite—when the worst passions of the human heart shall be roused into action—when our affections shall be estranged from our friends, and our hearts embittered against each other—when the whole interval between the different elections shall be employed in dreadful "note of preparation" for the ensuing contest—can Congress (if they are to elect) be free from the contagion? Will the Senate and House of Representatives, amidst the tumult of the political elements, sit, like a Halcyon, on the waves, undisturbed spectators of surrounding horrors? It is greatly to be feared, sir, that their more appropriate emblem, on such an occasion, will be, that dreadful whirlpool of the North, which draws into its fatal vortex every thing which falls within the influence of the eddies by which it is surrounded.

I come now, said Mr. H., to that unpleasant topic which has been unhappily introduced into the discussion. I mean a Congressional Caucus. The honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) in the course of his remarks in favor of an indefinite postponement of the resolutions, took occasion to mention, incidentally, a "central power," which had grown up at the Seat of Government, and which was destined, hereafter, to control the election of a President. The gentlemen on the other side have thought proper, in reply, to enter into a vindication of a Congressional Caucus for the nomination of a President. If their arguments could be confined to this hall, and were not calculated to have an influence on public opinion, I would not, perhaps, find myself called upon to notice them. But, believing that the subject is one of vast importance, that it touches the vital interests of the country, and may, in its remote consequences, endanger liberty itself, I find myself constrained to attempt an answer to the particular arguments which have been urged. I shall confine myself strictly to a defensive warfare—and shall enter no further into the discussion of the subject than may be necessary to reply to the arguments which have been urged on this floor.

It is contended by the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKERSON,) and the same argument has been urged by all the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, that a Congressional caucus for the nomination of a President, is not liable to any of the objections which may be urged against the election of a President by Congress, because the Senators and Representatives, in attending a caucus, act only in their private capacities. This appears to me, said Mr. H., to be a fallacy so obvious, that he was at a loss to conceive how any one could be deceived by it. Sir, if fifty or sixty private individuals should meet in this city and nominate a President, what effect would be produced by it? Would it be an event looked to with anxiety from every part of the country? Would it divide the nation into parties, or challenge the praise or the censure of every freeman in the land? No, sir; it is because the gentlemen who compose such a meeting are members of Congress—it is the authority with which they are clothed, that gives influence and effect to their proceedings. But for this, no such meeting would be held. They meet in their character of members of Congress, or they would not meet at all. It is true, they do not meet to perform a Legislative duty, and the very objection to the proceeding is, that they step beyond the line of their peculiar and appropriate duties, and use the influence attached to their offices for the promotion of an object not within their Congressional powers, and with which the spirit of the Constitution forbids them to interfere. To show, conclusively, that it is the influence attached to the office of a member of Congress which is the foundation of a Congressional caucus, and that it is expressly in their character of members of Congress that gentlemen attend such a meeting, Mr. H. adverted to the fact that none other are invited or suffered to attend. If gentlemen acted only in their private capacities, every American citizen—certainly every inhabitant of this District, would be at liberty to unite with them. Look, too, at the forms of proceeding in such cases; the Hall of Legislation is appropriated to their use; the Speaker's chair is occupied by the Chairman; the officers of the House are stationed at the door to prevent the entrance of any members of Congress, who are called up by States to give their suffrages. After this, tell us not that gentlemen act in their private capacities, and that, as members of Congress, they have no concern in the transaction! Sir, said Mr. H., I deny that a man can put off and put on, at pleasure, the official garb with which he is clothed. A man clothed with Executive authority cannot, as a private citizen, perform Legislative duties; neither can a member of Congress put off his character, and, as a private citizen, interfere with matters which the Constitution has wisely prohibited him from meddling with. I have heard, sir, said Mr. H., of a priest, who, walking to church in his robes of office, received an insult; he threw off his gown, exclaiming, "Lie there, divinity, until I punish that rascal;" and having, in his private capacity, inflicted the chastisement, he resumed the character of a clergyman, and proceeded to preach up "charity, and forgiveness of injuries, love to God, and good will towards man." If there be, said Mr. H., any sound distinction, any safe rule by which the private and public acts of an individual can be ascertained, it must be this—that matters, altogether of a private nature belong to the one, while matters of a public nature belong to the other. Bring a Congressional caucus to this test. The choice of a President is a public matter; it is a business provided for by the Constitution; the manner in which it is to be done is prescribed; the members of Congress are prohibited from being Electors, and the Senators can, in no possible event, have any thing to do with it. It cannot be possible, therefore, for members of Congress, as such, to meddle with it. Not being a private matter, if they act on it at all collectively, as a body, and by virtue of their office, it cannot be said that they act in their private capacities. I will proceed, said Mr. H., to give one or two illustrations of this subject, which I think will remove any doubts which may still rest upon it. Suppose the President and Heads of Departments were to meet together in their private capacities, were to nominate their successors, and were to proclaim such a nomination to the American people. The country would ring with denunciations of the act, the charges of usurpation, tyranny, and corruption, would rise up in every corner of the land, and they would meet the just vengeance of an injured people! And yet, have not the President and Heads of Departments as much a right to act, and to speak, in their private capacities, as any other members of the Government? They are no more prohibited from nominating a President than are the members of Congress; and more danger is to be apprehended from the influence of the latter than the former. Suppose the Judges of the Supreme Court were to step from the bench, put off their robes, and, after public notice, were to proceed, in their private capacities, to nominate a President, and publish that nomination to the world! How would such a proceeding be relished? And yet, the Executive and Judiciary have certainly an equal right with the Legislature to proceed to such a nomination, in their private capacities. Again, suppose the Governors of the several States were to consult and vote on the subject, and announce the result to the world, in order to produce union among the people. What would we think of such a proceeding? But, I will put, said Mr. H., a still stronger case—one perfectly analogous to that under consideration. Suppose a jury appointed to try a cause, civil or criminal. The law prescribes the place, the time, the mode and manner, in which the question is to be officially investigated, and decided. But these jurors think proper to meet together, previous to the trial, in their private capacities, to investigate the merits of the case; they come to a decision and publish the result! Would it be any excuse for such a proceeding to allege, that they did not act as jurors, but in their private capacities? And with what color of reason could such an excuse be made, if it were shown that they were summoned to the meeting as jurors eo nomine, that none other were admitted, that they appointed a foreman, passed through all the forms of a trial, and in the name and character of jurors, proclaimed the result. Now, said Mr. H., there is a more striking analogy between that case and the proceeding now under consideration, than gentlemen will be disposed to admit. The House of Representatives may, in one event, be called upon to choose the President. The Constitution has prescribed the time and place, and all the formalities of that proceeding; but, before the occasion occurs, the members of that House meet together in their private capacities, and examine the claims of the candidates, and without the light which further time and a more deliberate examination might afford, to make a choice, and publish the result. It is true, that the proceeding, in both cases, is without legal authority, and is not binding, but it is calculated to produce a dangerous influence, and is, therefore, wholly indefensible. To illustrate the truth that legislators cannot, consistently with the spirit of the Constitution, act in their private capacities on matters which may come before them officially, it may be asked, whether it would be justifiable for a majority of this Senate, as a party, to meet together habitually, in their private capacities, and determine, by a majority, what measures they should, as a body, support or oppose? By such an arrangement, all the guards by which pure and enlightened legislation is secured would be destroyed, and a small minority might sway the Senate. A Congressional caucus is open to the same objection. I confess, sir, said Mr. H., I have serious fears that, should the caucus system be firmly established in this country, it will eventually lead to the total destruction of the rights of the small States, and that the clause in the Constitution, which secures their just weight in the choice of a President, will be virtually repealed. Once recognise the distinction between a man's public and private capacity, in relation to public matters, and what is to restrain a few of the large States from appointing delegates, or instructing their members of Congress to meet in caucus, and determine, by a majority of votes, how these States shall act, and whom they shall support? I shall add nothing further, said Mr. H., in answer to the honorable gentlemen, on this point.

The next argument urged, is, that a Congressional caucus is free from objection, because it does not profess to elect, but only to nominate a President. Now, I would ask whether the design of this nomination is not to procure the election of some individual who would not be elected without it? If such be not the object, and if such were not the results hoped for, no nomination would be made; no caucus would be held. But, if a nomination is to have the effect of promoting a man to the Presidency who would not otherwise be promoted, it virtually amounts to an election; and is it any answer to this argument to say, that it is produced altogether by the authority and influence of members of Congress? Or, is not that the most objectionable means by which an election can be effected? But, sir, said Mr. H., let us bring this question to the test of principle, and see if the practice I am controverting will not directly deprive the people of the right of choosing among the several candidates for the Presidency? If a Congressional caucus be right in principle, as the gentlemen allege, it follows, that the friends of all the candidates ought to attend, and that, the strength of each being ascertained, the strongest should be supported by all, and the others should be withdrawn. Thus, the people will be deprived of the right of choosing, and must, of necessity, take the man recommended to them. Take the case of two candidates only, and such a case has occurred. A caucus decides between them, the other is bound to withdraw; he can, on principle, no longer be a candidate; his friends cannot support him; and, though nine-tenths of the people should prefer him, he cannot, as a man of principle, even consent to serve. Take another case. Suppose there should be five candidates—the five most prominent and popular men in the country. Apply the caucus principle, and it results in presenting but one candidate to the people, and they must take him, or look out at the eleventh hour for a new man, which, under such circumstances, would be impossible. The principle of a Congressional caucus, therefore, leads inevitably, and of necessity, to the destruction of the right of the people to elect the President, and if it does not, in practice, produce that result, it is only because so many of us are such political heretics as to refuse to recognise it; and because the several candidates and their friends will not consent to abide by it. But, let the principles of the gentleman prevail, and the President will, hereafter, be virtually elected by a caucus in Washington, and not by the people. Now, said Mr. H., there is not an objection which applies to the election of a President by the National Legislature, which does not apply much more strongly to a virtual election by a Congressional caucus. Does the former disturb legislation, tingeing every legislative act with party views and feelings, so, in a greater degree, does the latter. The letter and spirit of the Constitution is opposed to every species of interference, by the members of Congress, in the election of a President, except in the particular case of a failure by the people to elect. Then, and not till then, are Congress permitted to interfere; and the mode in which they are then to proceed is minutely prescribed. The House of Representatives only are to have any concern in the transaction, and they must vote by States. They are not permitted to elect any candidate according to their own views, feelings, or opinions, but they are compelled to choose one of three candidates previously elected and presented to them by the people. But a Congressional caucus is composed of Senators, as well as members of the House of Representatives, the former of whom are wisely excluded, by the Constitution, from voting on such a subject, because the tenure of their office renders them peculiarly liable to influence. They proceed to nominate the President before the people have proceeded to the election; they choose not from the candidates presented to them by the people, but according to their own pleasure, and are influenced by personal preferences; and, lastly, they make such a nomination, not in the extraordinary case (which may not occur once in a century) provided for in the Constitution, but at every election—once in every four years. Now, when to all this we add that, from the very nature of things, a caucus never will be composed of more than a portion of the members of Congress, so that the vote of an individual will be of such consequence as to justify the extraordinary efforts to obtain it; when it is recollected that a caucus nomination, every four years, will keep the matter constantly before Congress, can any man, who reflects on the subject, fail to see that the triumph and final establishment of the caucus system in Congress, must not only supersede and control the Constitution, but involves the introduction, into the Halls of Congress, of excitement, party feeling, management, and, finally, of intrigue and corruption; at the bare contemplation of which the heart of the patriot must sicken, and his anticipations of future glory be converted into the most gloomy forebodings.

Gentlemen tell us that a caucus is necessary to promote union. Should such a measure ever promote union, it can only be by controlling the will and stifling the voice of the people. But it seems to me, said Mr. H., that, so far from promoting harmony and union, a caucus is calculated to sow the seeds of dissension, and to prevent the possibility of union. To all the difficulties of selecting among men, is superadded the hostility created by the agitation of the caucus question. The degree of support to be yielded, or of opposition to be offered, to such a nomination, will always be a fruitful source of endless contests and animosities.

As a party measure, a caucus may, in some instances, tend to promote union. In such a case, two candidates at least would be presented to the people, for their choice. But, where all the candidates are of the same party, the only effect of a caucus must be to elevate a favorite individual, by putting all the other candidates out of the way, and thus to take the choice from the people, or from the States. If a caucus is to be resorted to at every Presidential election, and Congress is, by a preliminary vote, in joint ballot, to determine who is to be supported as President, it is manifest that the effect will be, to bring the election practically into Congress voting by polls and not by States; and thus the wise provisions of the Constitution will be repealed, without the least regard to the forms prescribed by that instrument. Gentlemen will surely not venture to affirm that union will be promoted by such means.

Much more might be said on this subject, said Mr. H., but he had not only confined himself to the general question, but had merely attempted to reply to the arguments urged on the other side. Of the particular character of the late meeting in Washington, he had said nothing, and alluded to it now only to disclaim any intention to wound the feelings or impeach the motives of any of the gentlemen connected with it. He entertained for them, collectively, much respect, and cherished for several of them, individually, sentiments of great esteem.

[In the course of Mr. H.'s remarks, he was interrupted by Mr. KING, of Alabama, who rose to a point of order. Mr. K. stated that he was not in health to attend the Senate yesterday; and he did not know, precisely, the course which the discussion had then taken. But he considered the present topic as having no relation to the subject before the Senate; and, consequently, the introduction of it as being a violation of the rules of this body. He therefore called the gentleman from South Carolina to order.]

The Chair observed, that a wide range had been allowed in the discussion of this subject yesterday; and while it entertained the hope that that discussion would not be extended, was, at the same time, of opinion, that members had a right to be heard, in answer to any arguments which had been brought forward yesterday. The member from South Carolina was declared to be in order.]

as entirely out of order, and foreign to the subject before the Senate. The question has been discussed, as it were a contest for power, between the large and the small States—as if each was endeavoring to effect the purposes of its own ambition—as if these amendments were so many nefarious designs to satisfy the ambition and avarice of the one or the other. If it be true, that the question is not, whether one State is to pilfer from the other, the great from the small, or the small from the great, still, he asked, what prospect there was of adopting any thing that is salutary under circumstances attended with so much exasperation. Mr. T. said, he had seconded the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts for postponement—both of us have bantlings of our own upon the table; but we are willing to part with them to give time for mature consideration. Mr. T. said he would take these different propositions home with him and study them carefully. The true question is, whether we will have a confederated, or a consolidated Government. Some are in favor of one, and some of the other. The inquiry ought to be, how far these amendments will go to cure the evils of the Constitution, or to introduce others into it. He meant only to show the propriety of postponing this subject, until it should be thoroughly considered. If the gentlemen will advert to the nature of our Government, they will see enough for observation. It is said to be a great machine; and we are told that the people are a safeguard against any disarrangement in it. When have they proved so? Were the people able to preserve their liberty, in the time of the French Convention? Other gentlemen will tell you, that the people are their own worst enemies. Perhaps, neither of these are perfectly correct. One of the Gods of ancient times, has told us,

"In medio tutissimus ibis."

There should be an intermediate controlling power. The great question to be considered is, whether any amendment of the Constitution will obviate the objections alleged against it. We must not place too much reliance on the word "people." Mr. TAYLOR said, the idea occurred to him, that the Federal Government was an immense machine—that the State governments were the safety-valves, to let off the gas of exclusive interests. While these safety-valves are kept in operation, and this gas is thus discharged, the country will go on well enough. But when they stop, and the gas comes to be concentrated, there is great danger to the whole machine. Mr. T. said he would conclude by telling an anecdote which occurred to his recollection, and which all would probably remember. James the Second once called on two of his Bishops, to know if, in their opinions, he had not a right to take the property of his people as he pleased. Bishop A, (he did not remember their names,) said he certainly had that right—the King was the vicegerent of God; and he had certainly a right to appropriate the property of his subjects as he saw fit—he might employ the men and the money, as he pleased. The King then asked Bishop B, what he thought of the doctrine of his brother Bishop? "Why," says B, "I think the King has a right to take the property of my brother A, because he has given it to him. But I think he has no right to take mine." The basis of liberty is upon this point. When you revert to the geographical distinctions of this country, do you think the people will display the servility of Bishop A? Why is the remark of Bishop B so much praised? Because the true doctrine is, that representation and taxation shall go hand in hand. The King could not take his money, because he did not represent him. This doctrine, Mr. T. applied to the amendments proposed to the Constitution, to test their agreement with the spirit of our representative Government, &c.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, then rose. He had prepared, he said, to give a silent vote on this question; but, as the unpleasant topic of yesterday had been brought again before the Senate, he felt it his duty to say something upon it. Some circumstances and reflections had been introduced, to which he conceived a reply to be necessary. He intended to place the meeting which had been alluded to, on what he conceived to be defensible ground. His remarks would necessarily be desultory. But, as the question before the Senate was upon the amendments to the Constitution, it was due to the body which he had the honor to address, to make some remarks in reference thereto.

As regards the Constitution of the United States, Mr. B. said, he always approached it with reverence; in the wisdom of its provisions, he saw the great source of the happiness and prosperity of the country. Our ancestors, who emigrated here, brought with them that inextinguishable love of freedom which enabled them to pass, in success, the waste of waters, and in a howling wilderness to lay the foundation of a mighty empire, whose astonishing growth and happiness are ascribable, in great part, to this instrument. But still, deeply as he felt impressed with the sacred character of this instrument, his reverence did not amount to idolatry; he knew it was the work of man; that it was made in the infancy of political science, and before experience in the secrets of self-government had furnished a guide. It was justly entitled to admiration; not that there were no errors in it, but because it had so nearly answered, in practical operation, all the purposes for which it was established. Although it was an object of reverence, it should not be of idolatry; we should leave ourselves open to a conviction of its defects; and it behooves those, whom the people have intrusted to look after their interests, to profit by experience; and, if any error presents itself, to correct and amend it. But, he well recollected the old adage, that people should be contented when they are doing well; lest, in trying to do better, they should only make their condition worse. It is a good maxim in government—particularly in legislation. When he looked round the country, Mr. B. said, he could see no great impending evils to dread. He would not say that he himself had not been disposed, heretofore, to propose amendments to the Constitution. It is the natural disposition of mankind,

Amendments to the Constitution.

SENATE.

to think that we can see deeper into affairs than our neighbors; and he once thought so, in regard to the Constitution; perhaps it was vanity in him to think so. The honorable gentleman from New Jersey saw fit to advise the Senate, some days since, that the plan which he, (Mr. BARBOUR) had proposed, had failed. But that plan did not propose a change in the foundation of that compromise, which led to the adoption of the Constitution. If he found it impossible to unite this body, upon that proposition, and if they rejected that amendment, he asked, what prospect there was of obtaining the passage of an amendment, which was going to dislocate the most important parts of the Government, by changing the relative power between the small and large States, in the election of the Chief Magistrate? In his opinion, Mr. B. said, it was unnecessary to consume the time of Congress, when it was quite impossible to come to any result upon this subject. There are now two distinct propositions before the Senate. The one proposes to divide the States into districts; and, when the election is not made in the first instance, it is to be carried to the two Houses of Congress. The other gives the election of President directly to the people—and, in the event of a failure to choose, by the House of Representatives, voting by States. Now, what is the spirit of the Constitution? It is partly Federal and partly National. The influence of the States would be destroyed entirely, as sovereign and independent States, by cutting them up into districts. The great State of New York, (for the sceptre has now departed out of Judah, and we must look up to New York as the greatest State,)—the great State of New York, by this system, would be reduced, in point of influence, to a level with the small State of Delaware. So in a reference of the election immediately to the people, the federative character of the Government would be destroyed entirely. The Government would be entirely national, and not federal. But, Mr. BARBOUR said, he would not, at this time, go into any further consideration of these amendments, as he had, on former occasions, delivered his sentiments fully on the subject. He concurred with his honorable colleague, in the opinion, that it would be better to wait until the evils of the present system became more manifest; and then it would be early enough to suggest amendments. He would not now take notice of the observations which had been heretofore made, upon the different modes of appointing Electors, which had been adopted by the different States. The Constitution gave an undoubted power to the State Legislatures, to determine the manner in which the Electors shall be chosen. Some of the Legislatures retain the right to choose them, in their own hands; some choose by a general ticket; others by districts—according to their sovereign pleasure. He could not see that any mischief had resulted from this practice. He thought it better to take a longer time to develop the provisions of the Constitution, as it now stands, and be sure you see the remedy, as well as the evil, before any change should be made in it. It was not impossible that a change might introduce still greater errors. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MILLS) has produced an amendment, to restore the Constitution to the situation in which it originally stood, in respect to the election of President and Vice President. This shows that it is doubted, by some, whether the amendment which has already been made has proved beneficial. It may be matter of speculation, whether the difficulties we see, are not rather the result of the infirmities of our nature, than of the Constitution. For these reasons, Mr. B. said, he was in favor of indefinite postponement.

He came now to the topic to which he had first alluded. He must be permitted to mingle his regret with that of the other members, that such a subject had been introduced into this body; not that he had the slightest objection to a critical examination of it. Whatever had been done, in reference to that subject, was not secret, it was done in public; it was done before the people; and their decision will be made upon it. Whatever of malice there was in human nature, had been uttered against the individuals who attended that meeting. He did not regret that the subject had found its way here, because he feared a fair investigation of it, but because, into this body, subjects of that kind ought not to be introduced. It could not have failed to bring forth the expression of feelings which ought not to be indulged here. When that meeting was represented as a great central power, which was about to overwhelm the Constitution, surely those who heard it, and who attended that meeting, could not refrain from replying. If there was any spot on earth, which he considered as consecrated to peace and harmony, it was the Senate of the United States. It should be our political holy of holies—where the brand of discord was never to be thrown—where tranquillity and mature deliberation should acquire the respect of the people. He had considered this body the sheet-anchor of the nation—as presenting a limit to the waves of the other branch, and equally inaccessible to Executive influence—a body, whose character for propriety should never be jeopardized. He believed the nation had indulged a confidence that, whatever storms might rage elsewhere, nothing but coolness and deliberation would preside here. Is this question one that, in its discussion, is calculated to promote the dignity of this body? Is it one that is calculated to enter this Hall? Surely not. And what is the gentleman's apology for introducing the subject? The gentleman from New Jersey charged him with having changed his opinion, in respect to the propriety of amending the Constitution; that, last year, he was in favor of an amendment, and this year opposed to it. The gentleman from New York states as a reason for this change, that a central power, of an alarming character, had since sprang up to his view. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) has charged the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) with having been first to mention the word "caucus." This, Mr. B. said, he thought was unjust. If the gentleman from New York (Mr. KING) did not make use of the word, nobody could mistake the meaning of his "great central power." The gentleman's description bore the name upon its front.

To an unadvised stranger, who had heard the gentleman from New York, it would seem that a monster of yesterday had sprung up, who was threatening to devastate the country—and yet, Mr. B. asked, was this any new measure? Was it not adopted in 1800, 1804, 1808, 1812, and 1816? Yet it did not then meet the gentleman's attention, or call forth such violent reprehension from him; but, in 1824, it suddenly swells to a great measure, threatening destruction to the Constitution. Whence did the system originate? Mr. B. believed, with the Revolution itself. It was the venerated Samuel Adams, or his father, who first suggested it. It had its origin in the spirit that gave birth to this nation. Wherever freemen are, they will assemble and converse freely about men and measures. And a custom that has produced so much good, cannot itself be very bad. Mr. B. said, he had a witness here at his left, (alluding, probably, to Mr. Macon,) who could tell how necessary such meetings had been found, in the early days of this Government—a gentleman who then stood, as he now stands, the guardian of his native land. Why did he not warn the people against a system which, according to the gentleman from New York, is now, like another unshorn Sampson, about to embrace the pillars of the Constitution, and whelm the splendid fabric in ruins? Surely this is the mere phantom of the gentleman's imagination. What is this Constitution? We have a vast continent, over which it is to operate—a multiplicity of different States. What is the spirit of the Constitution in regard to the election of President? That numbers shall prevail, in the first instance—and, in the contingency of a non-election by the Electors, that the House of Representatives shall choose. Now, is not the first of these provisions mere mockery, unless there can be some inter-communication of sentiment, previous to the election? What is it we have done? Venal hirelings of the press, directed, in some instances, by the outcasts of Europe, and upon whose foreheads, if they had their deserts, ought to hang the label "to be let," have accused us, whose all is here, and who have been honored with the highest offices in the gift of the people—of conspiring against the liberty of the country and seeking to overthrow the Constitution. Where was the meeting held? In the Chamber of the House of Representatives—in public—in the very face of the people—those people whose rights it is said we met to betray—and the result is well known. Was there any intention to recommend a man who was abhorrent to the people? If the people are united in favor of another man, the recommendation would not weigh a feather. If they were not united, the meeting might have a tendency to produce that effect. Men are apt to attach too much importance to themselves and their acts, when "dressed in a little brief authority;" they are found, however, to be but the merest insects, when acting in opposition to the views of the people. Nothing important can result from such a meeting, unless the candidate selected is a popular man. The simple reason for holding such a meeting is, that the persons who go into it are the representatives of the people—that they best know the sentiments of the people—they, therefore, meet to recommend candidates. If this be not the correct way, what other will you substitute? By private recommendation, and, as a consequence, irresponsible, or to the conflicting presses? Mr. B. said, he was the last man who would lift his voice to curtail the liberty of the press. No, even in the rank luxuriance of its licentiousness, let it be uncurbed. When honestly directed, it is the great source of light and liberty. Its abuse must be tolerated, on that universal law which belongs to human things, that there is no unmixed blessing; but it must not be disguised, that, when prostituted, it scatters any thing but correct information.

We are told, that the President and the Heads of Departments may, with equal propriety, meet, and make a nomination. But they do not come immediately from the people; and they are not going back to the people, as the members of Congress must. They are not so immediately identified with all parts of the community. What we have done, is on record—every man is responsible for his own act. The old adage is, that, by its fruit the tree shall be known. What has been the result of this practice for the last twenty years? Where has been the mischief? Has your Constitution been violated? Is not our happy situation an object of congratulation? Is not every nation which is striving to break the fetters of slavery, looking to us as the landmarks, by which they are to be guided? These are the fruits of this system, which has been followed, in relation to the Presidential election, from 1800, up to the present day; which has been sustained by the people; and which has some of the greatest names in the country to support it.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina says, that the grounds of holding this meeting were, to produce union—but, from the signs of the times, he gathers the belief that it will, on the contrary, produce nothing but discord. Mr. B. said, as he was not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, he could not tell what the effect of the meeting would be. The wisdom of the people, perhaps, might substitute something else—the people care little about names. We have adopted a plan, by which we proposed to surrender our private feelings, whatever they might be, upon the altar of the public good. I ask gentlemen to propose a substitute for the caucus. Here are five candidates, all good men; there is no union among the people—they are divided into five parties. What is to be the result? The other day we were a band of brothers. What is now the case? In consequence of a difference of opinion, slander is poured out from the press; a thousand pens are employed in the work of defamation; every infirmity is displayed; calumny is spread, upon every side—and it is melancholy, indeed, to reflect that too many are ready to believe the fabrications. This is now but a little spark, but it may spread out till it consumes every thing that is good and valuable. How is the monster to be stifled? Only by making useful sacrifices. A meeting, for that purpose was called—all were invited to attend—the object was to arrive at some union; to close these flood-gates of iniquity. We regretted that our brethren did not all come in with us. Mr. B. said, he arraigned no man's motives—each one must go his own ways. Other counsels might prevail—he dreaded to hear what might be the result of the malignity, which this controversy had excited. He was prepared to unite with the majority. This, that, or the other name, was insignificant to him, compared with the good of the Union. It is said, that it is a fallacy to pretend that we went to that meeting in our private characters. We are told that the President, the Heads of Departments, or any of the people might go there, with equal propriety; and we have been told a humorous anecdote on this point, concerning a priest. To this, Mr. B. answered, that the members of Congress went there, to say to the American people that they believed this, or that, candidate would be most acceptable to the people. A fact only was to be made known. Each man represents the feelings of his own section of the country. James Barbour represents that his constituents are of one opinion; the gentleman from South Carolina, that his are of another. The members attending the meeting are from different sections of the Union—they are the organs of communication. Their meeting is merely for the general concentration of opinion. The gentleman from South Carolina animadverts on the character assumed by the members in the meeting—that of their individual capacity—and asks, why are not other citizens admitted? The answer to this remark is obvious. Other citizens are not in the situation of members of Congress, because they are not presumed, as are the members of Congress, who come from every part of the Union, to know, accurately, the wishes of the great body of the people. It is not the official station that gives weight to an expression of the opinion of members of Congress; but it is the confidence they enjoy among their fellow-citizens that made them members of Congress. This confidence is a part of their character, and is made available in their private capacity.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina says, he never attended a caucus. This is certainly a little extraordinary for a member of this body. There may be some few individuals here who have not attended such meetings; but when he recollected how common they had been, for the last forty or fifty years, he apprehended there were few who had not taken part in them. When he was very young, Mr. B. said, he recollected to have gone, with his honorable colleague, to the first meeting of this kind which he ever attended. Under authority so respectable, and in such a school, he had first become acquainted with the system; and he had, ever since, continued believing that its results must be beneficial. When he knew that this system was approved by older men; that it had been used effectually in the days of Jefferson, he could hardly believe that the younger members knew all the benefits that had been derived from it. It is too old in this country—opposition to it will not do. Some may be opposed to it, from their private views; others may not think it expedient at this time. There are regular cycles in political events; and, Mr. B. said, he did not doubt but these meetings, by and by, would become popular enough; for, as they have been so heretofore, it will be seen that they are still necessary.

In regard to the anti-caucus, which had been spoken of, he did not wish to become the accuser of any man. He should, therefore, say nothing of it. This whole subject had gone out to the people. It ought not to have been touched here. There has been a fair and open appeal to the people, and the Senate should not have been troubled with it. There we are willing to meet it; not before a few changelings in the country, but before the great mass of the people, who are independent, and who stand clear of prejudices on this subject. If, when these acts are fairly laid open, such a tribunal condemns us, be it so. Mr. B. said, when he embarked on the sea of political life, he well knew that there were shoals in it. Some get their vessels over them safely; while others strike upon them, and sink forever. But he made the declaration in the face of all who heard him, that he had the approbation of what he had done, in his own conscience—that was placed beyond all human control; and, when the plaudits of this world should cease, that approbation would be imperishable; it would enable him to tread the shadowy vale of death, without fear or trembling. Standing on this sure foundation, unseduced by ambition, whose giddy heights he had never essayed, as far as it concerned his personal views, he was above, and he rejoiced in his attitude, every change in political opinion; and if the Government be honestly administered, he cared not by what hands, or to whom were distributed the loaves and fishes.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, he should vote against an indefinite postponement. The State of Maryland, said he, has instructed its Senators to use their best endeavors to obtain such an amendment to the Constitution as will insure a uniform mode of election throughout the United States, of President and Vice President. The district mode is preferred by that State, which meets my concurrence, and I shall vote for any of the resolutions that will be most likely to succeed, and will assure that mode. Having entered yesterday into my reasons on the subject, I will not again trespass on the time of the Senate, by repetition. Indeed, Mr. President, I had no intention of speaking on the subject again, nor should I, but for an observation made by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE.) He has said, "that I was the first who introduced the word 'caucus' into the discussion." Why this observation? For what purpose? Was it any way necessary or useful to his argument?

Mr. HAYNE explained. He certainly meant nothing unkind towards the gentleman. Regret had been expressed that this word had been used; and he had merely observed, that he believed that it had first been used by the gentleman from Maryland.

SENATE.

Amendments to the Constitution.

MARCH, 1824.

Mr. SMITH resumed. Mr. President, I feel perfectly confident that the gentleman entertains no unfriendly feelings towards me personally; but, as the remark had been made, I am unwilling that the discussion of a subject so unprofitable, that I feel mortified at its being introduced, and so little comporting with the dignity of the Senate, should be attributed to me. I regret that the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. KING) should have deemed it proper to introduce it. It is true that he qualified it by a new name—"central power." However, either my ears deceived me, or I heard him use the word "caucus," and one member opposite took it down; but, whether he did or not, his meaning was perfectly understood; and, if I used it, it was because I wished to give it the known name—I wished to call a spade a spade.

When first introduced I considered it as accidental, and treated it lightly, as I thought it merited. But, sir, the second speech of the introducer, and the elaborate view taken by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, have given to it form and substance. Effect seems now to be contemplated, and we must meet it as we best can.

I am not surprised at the course taken by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. He was too young to know the extreme difficulties the Republican party had to encounter, and the dangers it has been exposed to by attempts calculated to create schisms that might have, by dividing, exposed it to great danger; which, in my humble opinion, have been mainly obviated and avoided by the caucus system. Nor am I at all surprised at the opposition to it by the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. KING.) That gentleman was a leading chief of the Federal party, and he, no doubt, thinks, what I know and believe, that, owing to the caucus system, his party was prostrated, and the Republican party brought into power; by which change, I firmly believe, and every republican does believe, that the nation has greatly benefited. I adhere to that which has rendered such essential service to my country, and the party to which I belong. The bridge which has carried me safe over, I call a good bridge. The caucus system has heretofore been approved. I attended several, was president at one—and consistency of conduct called imperiously on me to attend that lately held, and which has met with the disapprobation of the two gentlemen. It appears, also, to have met with the displeasure of several gentlemen with whom I have served in caucus more than once. Well, sir, they have their reasons, such as are satisfactory to themselves, with which I have nothing to do. That of being conscientiously against it, they cannot offer. There are certainly some who think the system wrong on principle. The gentleman from South Carolina has said so; but their numbers, among politicians, are few. I have not met with many. May we not, without offence, believe that men are much governed by the consideration of whether the caucus will or will not support their favorite candidate? And must we not believe that those who have heretofore attended caucuses, will find it difficult to assign any other reason for absenting themselves from that which they now censure? Indeed, Mr. President, I must think that it had a powerful influence, although, perhaps, unknown to themselves. I mean no reflection on any one; but form my opinion from man as he is constituted.

I will now, Mr. President, take a view of the caucus system as it has operated; and, I trust, I shall be able to show that it has enabled the Republican party to mount into power, and has tended, mainly, to maintain them in it. Upon this theme I act as a party man, and have no hesitation in saying that I wish to keep my party in power; that I believe the caucus system is the most effectual means; and that, when we cease to use it, we shall thereby deprive ourselves of one most powerful instrument. Divide and conquer, is as old as history—keep together, you cannot be subdued.

Mr. President: On the first contested election, between Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Adams succeeded by, I believe, a small majority. It was believed that his success was owing to want of a conjoined effort, a concentration of force, on the part of the friends of Mr. Jefferson. A caucus was, in consequence, held in Philadelphia, the object of which was, to make a conjoined effort to concentrate all the strength of the party, and to bind each to the other, that they would use their best exertions to promote the election of Mr. Jefferson. I did not attend, but, I believe, every other member of either House, friendly to Mr. Jefferson, did attend. Who were they? Men certainly as capable of expounding the Constitution as any gentleman now in my hearing; one of them the writer, in part, of the Federalist, (to which we daily refer,) in fact, all of them leaders in the republican ranks, and to whom we are indebted for the change by which the Republican party came into power; those great men are now charged, by the gentleman from New York, with being promoters of a system which, in its consequences, is to destroy the Constitution, and to introduce all the plagues of Egypt. Well, sir, I am not surprised at this charge, for the honorable gentleman was one of those who lost the power. Losers will complain, and we ought not to be surprised that the gentleman is very willing to put down a system by which his party has lost their power; it is natural, and it is as natural for me to wish to continue a system, by which I (as one of the gainers) have succeeded. I have said that I did not attend the first caucus; but, sir, I assured those who did, that I would act with them, and I did, as the people of Maryland know. I used exertions, that I think I should not, if the caucus had not been held. Its decision induced me, and others, in Maryland, to unexampled exertion; much depended on its vote. At that time the State was decidedly in favor of Mr. Adams. It was changed by the exertions made by the republicans, which, I speak with confidence, would not have been made, if no caucus had been held.

Amendments to the Constitution.

SENATE.

A caucus was held at the second election of Mr. Jefferson, at which almost every republican member did attend. It was not then thought a crime; on the contrary, it was deemed meritorious. If I had not attended it, I am sure my constituents, at that time, would have been displeased; no one then talked of a caucus being an assumption of power; I mean no republican. I believe the Federalists did, but it was attributed to the injury the system did to them as a party; we did not think them in earnest; we considered their opposition as arising simply from opposition.

The next caucus selected Mr. Madison, and I never heard that he thought their act other than Constitutional; he had attended the first caucus in Philadelphia, and was a principal leader in it. He accepted the nomination. We all know that he was opposed by Mr. Monroe. A schism was threatened (by that opposition) in the Republican party; it was supported by the Federal party, and never was the Republican party in greater danger. What prevented that great evil? The caucus nomination. No other course could have succeeded. The people rallied around that nomination, and a schism was thereby prevented.

Mr. President: Some (now present) know that a schism in the Republican party had nearly taken place, on the election of the present Chief Magistrate. The opposition to him was strong in numbers and character, and there was every reason to believe that the Republican party would be severed. How was it avoided? The republicans met as brethren of the same family, agreed on Mr. Monroe, and all supported him. He and the Vice President were informed, by letters, signed by me and the secretary of the caucus, of their nomination, to which they replied, by letters, which have been published. Neither showed any reluctance at the mode of nomination; neither objected to a caucus power of nomination; they both seemed well satisfied, and appeared to accept with pleasure. The present President expressed himself, with strong approbation, of the source of nomination. His words are—"Deeply penetrated by this distinguished mark of confidence, emanating from such a source." What source? The caucus.

I have shown that the caucus system has been considered, by our three Republican Presidents, as not only Constitutional, but expedient. They have never said that it was dangerous to the liberties of the country. It has existed for twenty-four years, and the liberties of the people appear just as safe, and rather safer, than some of us thought they were prior to its being adopted.

Now, sir, suppose that all the republicans had met (agreeably to open invitation) like brethren of the same family, as they did on all former occasions, and had agreed (as they might have done) on a candidate, what would have been the consequence? It might have continued the union of the party. And of what mighty consequence is it which of the candidates shall be successful? Either of them will do tolerably well. Congress will take care that neither shall do much harm. I have my preference, I admit; but, had another been selected, I would have supported him; for my object is union in the Republican party. Gentlemen, (many of them my friends,) with whom I have acted through the worst of times, declined to attend; their motives are their own. But what is the effect? A complete disunion of the Republican party, divided into at least four parties; the whole in a state of distraction. Father against son, brother against brother; all in a state of complete confusion; and what for? For a principle? No, sir, there is no principle involved. What then is all this noise about? Why, whether you shall choose A, B, C, or D; and, choose which you will of the candidates, the nation will (if the people choose such Congresses as the three last) move on majestically towards its great destiny. When I look around, I am surprised at the excitement artificially created. Now, Mr. President, the difference between those who attended the caucus, and those who did not, I take to be this: that those who went, were anxious to unite on some one Republican candidate, and support him, be he whom he might, and thus preserve the union of the party; and those who did not attend, were willing to risk all, rather than run the risk of their candidate being in the minority. From this last, I except, of course, the gentleman from South Carolina and the conscientious.

Mr. President: In a Government like ours, where many of our great officers are elected, there must be some mode adopted by which to concentrate the votes of the people. They cannot (scattered as they are,) know the candidates—it is morally impossible: the voters must therefore depend on some person, some public bodies, or on private meetings for information, as to the best character for the office. For instance, "for President." Well, sir, it has been thought, for twenty-four years last past, that the members of Congress, elected by the people, and in whom they had deposited all confidence, was the best source for information. Has that source deceived the people in any one instance? I understand that the Congressional caucus recommended Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. The people elected them; and experience has shown that the reliance placed by the people in the caucus nomination of all three has turned out perfectly satisfactory, and no injury has resulted therefrom. It is rational to suppose, that the members of Congress have better opportunities of knowing the character and talents of the several candidates, than those who have never seen them, and never acted with them. However, the caucus mode is denounced, and now let us see what is to be substituted, for there will be a substitute. It is in the nature of our Government. It cannot be avoided. Well, sir, one State by an act of its Legislature, nominates its favorite, that is, the favorite of a majority of the body; another Legislature, in their private capacity, nominate their candidate, and forbid their members of Congress, chosen, as they are, by the people, from recommending a candidate. Now, sir, I would ask, how many of that Legislature knew any of the other candidates except the one recommended by them? perhaps three or four, who may have been in Congress. Other States have pursued a similar course, with as little knowledge of the candidates. Each State has its favorite candidate; of him they may know something. But how they can be capable of forming a judgment between him and those who are opposed to him, I know not. Many State Legislatures have undertaken to recommend, whilst they reprobate the caucus nomination. Another mode has been adopted: by convention. I should like to know how the delegates to the convention are chosen: are they by the people? I believe not. A few people meet; their numbers may be ten, fifty, or any other number, and they appoint the delegates; and, thus chosen, they meet in convention, and select their candidates. Now, Mr. President, whether either of those modes is preferable to a caucus, or whether any of them are equal to it, is to be determined. For my part, I thought the old mode was the best, and I have adopted it. I have exercised my own opinion. I have given myself no uneasiness about that of others. And I must think, an interference with the opinion of those who attended the caucus, was wholly irrelevant to the subject-matter before the Senate.

Mr. EATON, of Tennessee, said, he considered this subject of discussion as altogether improper, and thought it ought not to be permitted to remain any longer before the Senate. The Senate has now spent two days in debating the question, whether it is proper for members of Congress to go into caucus. He sincerely believed that such a subject was unbecoming the dignity of the body, and that it would place the members in no very elevated view before the public. His object was to put an end to the discussion. He suggested to the consideration of the Senate, whether it was not better to let it end here. He moved that the resolution be ordered to lie on the table.

The question on Mr. E.'s motion was put, and passed in the negative. The question then recurred on indefinite postponement.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, next addressed the Chair. He said that these resolutions had been referred to a select committee; they had been maturely considered and reported upon by that committee; and now, because a certain other subject, not connected with them, had been introduced, no vote was to be taken upon them. What is the question before the Senate? It is upon the indefinite postponement of the resolutions; and not upon their subject-matter. Why should not a fair vote be taken on them? Gentlemen who are not entirely decided on business before the Senate generally vote for a postponement. He thought no proposition to amend the Constitution, that had ever been before the Senate, had so much in favor of it, as the one that had been reported by this committee. It had, first or last, been recommended by almost every one of the States. And now, after all the time that has been spent about it, after one of the propositions had been discussed at full length, they are all to be thrown by. He well knew that men would do, in relation to these things, as they thought right. He considered it an extremely unfortunate circumstance, that a subject which had nothing to do with the real question before the Senate had been introduced, and was about to destroy all chance of considering the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. M. said, he knew that no amendment could now be made to affect the next election. There must be a concession of opinion somewhere—everybody feels the embarrassments we are laboring under; and yet we are not permitted to go on and discuss the amendments by which these evils might be remedied. This amendment, he thought, would insure an election, without going to the House of Representatives; and he hoped it would not be postponed. It is time enough to postpone them, when we find that we cannot make one that is fit to be adopted. We shall, then, have done our duty to our constituents as faithful men. But now we are about to postpone them at the very threshold. If there ever was a time when the subject could be met gravely, it is the present. What was the condition of the country at the time of the difficulty in the election of Jefferson and Burr? Great anxiety was spread from one end of the country to the other. The House of Representatives was voting thirty times without coming to a decision—the most serious alarm pervaded the country. And yet, with this knowledge before us, we are not willing to make provision against similar occurrences. There was a charge of foreign partiality on each side of the great parties existing at that time. One was accused of fondness for the British; the other, for the French. There is no disposition of that kind now. We have peace, and we have plenty to eat; and, thank Heaven, the tariff bill has not yet passed. Some think that the amendment will produce a consolidation of the Government, and that the State lines will be lost. But almost all the States have agreed to it—almost all of them have called for the districting system. Mr. M. said he did not believe that it would destroy the Constitution. He had heard so much, and so often, of the destruction of the Constitution, that he had almost become an infidel in respect to it. We have stood a sedition law, and an alien law, and there is not much danger but we may get along with any thing else. We have had these amendments regularly brought before us; and now, all at once, because allusions have been made to another subject, we cannot look at the amendments—we have got into a passion, and we must give them up. Nearly all the States have approved the districting system—and how is it to destroy the Constitution? The liberty of this nation does not, nor does that of any other, depend upon paper. It must have a foundation in the hearts of the people. Let a man depend upon himself, and he is free. If he is dependent on another, black or white, he will not be free. Freedom rests upon our dependence or independence. The people had, at first, a great dread of the President and Senate; but that fear has passed away.

We have now more candidates for the Presidency than we have ever had before. How are my people, said Mr. M., to know these men? Why, when I go home, they will ask me whom I think to be the best man; or rather, who will tax them the least? which is the same thing. And, I presume, the same questions are put to other members. I am glad my colleague called for the yeas and nays on this question, for I hope the subject will not be postponed. In regard to caucuses, I have no confessions to make. I have gone into caucus as honestly as I go to church. I do not care how many caucuses, or how few, there are. I care nothing about them. Once, however, I was, about twenty years past, taken in by a caucus, and said I would not attend another. I had intended to have given a history of some, on different sides, but it is decided not to be in order.

How the choice of Electors, by districts, could possibly prevent an election of President, as has been said by the gentleman from South Carolina, I cannot possibly perceive. The number of votes given by the districts would be equal to that now given. I do not understand how it can prevent an election. Every generation has its own notions in politics as well as in religion. Religious and political ideas are constantly changing. The Book of Judges gives a description of these changes, where it speaks of the departure of the people, after the death of Joshua. So we forgot the principles which produced the Revolution. My State, happily, is neither a large nor a small one. It enjoys about an equal population, and does not increase much. What benefit can the present provision of the Constitution be if we get no President by it? I hope the Senate will return to the consideration of the proposed amendments.

On motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, March 22.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, gave notice, that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to bring in a joint resolution authorizing the President to procure an equestrian portrait of WASHINGTON.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency and practicability of extinguishing the Indian title to certain districts of country on the south side of Lake Superior, supposed to contain valuable mines of copper.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives, in Congress, to use their utmost influence to prevent the passage of the bill now before Congress, imposing a prohibitory duty on sales at auction; which were read, and laid on the table.

Mr. HENRY JOHNSON presented the memorial and petition of A. Moore, and others, inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying that that part of the District of Columbia included within the limits of said county may be receded to the State of Virginia; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LOWRIE gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill extending the benefit of copy-rights to authors of paintings or drawings.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The unfinished business of Friday last, being the consideration of the resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, in relation to the election of President and Vice President, was again taken up. The question was upon Mr. MILLS's motion to postpone the whole subject indefinitely.

[The Chair, previous to the commencement of the discussion, intimated its intention to restrict the debate to the immediate question upon the indefinite postponement of the resolutions.]

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, said that he was disposed to yield a cheerful obedience to the decision of the Chair, although he had not had the opportunity of replying to some pointed observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) which might be easily answered. He regretted that the subject had been introduced, as it was calculated to create much unnecessary excitement. The discussion of it, however, had given him no uneasiness, either as it respected himself, or his friends; and he was perfectly content to let it rest where it was.

I shall, said Mr. D., confine myself to the motion which admits a discussion of the merits of the resolutions to be postponed. And it is with reluctance I again speak upon this question; for I fear that it will be found impossible in the mode now proposed to introduce any amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall have the least bearing upon the relative power of the great and small States. Mutual jealousies are easily excited. The interests of the great and small States are easily set in array against each other. Any attempt to promote a plan of mutual concession, a plan upon which the Constitution itself was formed, may be represented as an invasion of the rights of one class of States, and an abandonment of those of the other. At this time, such a Constitution as we now have, could not be formed. It was adopted at a fortunate period. Fortunately for the large States, still more so for the small. For these reasons, I begin to despair of seeing any of the proposed amendments succeed, unless upon a call of a convention of the States, under the fifth article of the Constitution; and, therefore, I was disposed to let the subject rest, at least for the present session. But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) calls me up to answer for myself. He accuses me of aiming a deadly blow at the rights of the small States, by taking from them powers necessary to their existence. If I have done this, I have forfeited all claim to the confidence of the State which has done me the honor to place me here. The gentleman certainly had no intention of producing an impression of this kind. But it is not the less incumbent on me to repel his observations, which were strong and pointed.

I introduced that part of the resolution to which the gentleman alludes—the election of a President, in the last resort, by a joint ballot of the two Houses of Congress, with great diffidence; without any strong confidence that the plan proposed would be practicable; a plan I would myself abandon, should it not meet the approbation of the small States; and more especially, if it should not meet the approbation of the State to which I have the honor to belong—for, upon this subject, the will of my State is my law. I neither expected, nor wished, that it should receive the decision of the two Houses of Congress this session. I introduced it as a subject worthy of discussion, believing it the only intermediate ground upon which the friends of the great and friends of the small States can ever meet. If some better plan can be suggested, I shall at once adopt it; for, upon this subject, pride of opinion shall have no influence with me.

For more than twenty years, the great dangers of a Presidential election have been felt. Efforts have incessantly been made to afford a remedy. This has never been more apparent than at the commencement of the present session of Congress. A discussion upon this subject has already taken place, in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate no less than six amendments have been proposed to the Constitution, as to the election of a President.

The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) has shown, in the strongest colors, the dangers of our present system, and the absolute necessity of districting the States for the purpose of choosing a President, so as to leave me but little to add upon that subject. A bare majority in the Legislatures of six of the large States, having 133 Electors, can completely control the rest of the Union, upon the election of a President, under the present system: that is, a little more than one-fourth of the people of the United States can impose a President upon the residue, amounting to nearly three-fourths. This is an enormous power, growing out of the operation of the Constitution, but which was not foreseen by those who formed that instrument. By this, the small States, containing a large majority of the people of the United States, may be rendered utterly insignificant in the choice of a President. By this, the voice of eighteen, of the twenty-four States, may be completely suppressed. But the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAYLOR) says this is one of the great federal features of the Constitution, which ought to be held sacred. Whether it be federal, or whether it be national, it is equally dangerous to the liberties of the people. This enormous power must be dreaded by all but those who wield it. It must be dreaded by all but the influential men in the great States, who may control those States, and through them, the Union.

The small States ask the large to divest themselves of this enormous power, by adopting a system of single districts, for the choice of Electors. The great States refuse to yield up any portion of this power, unless the small States consent to make a corresponding concession on their part.

What is the power of the small States, when the election of a President devolves upon the House of Representatives? Thirty-one Representatives, from thirteen small States, can, by possibility, elect the President, against 182 Representatives: that is, about one-seventh of the Representatives may control the other six-sevenths upon the election of a President. And this is the other great federal feature of the Constitution to which some gentlemen of late appear to be much attached. Under one of these great federal features of the Constitution, the power of the small States may be completely merged in the election by Electors. Under the other, the power of the great States may be as completely merged, in the election of a President, in the House of Representatives. Can any thing be more incongruous, more preposterous, more monstrous? The venerable gentleman from Virginia, who fears the national, but is charmed with the great federal features of our Constitution, compares the operations of our Government to those of the steam engine; and he informs us of a variety of safety valves, by which the steam may pass off, without danger to the machine. I do not perceive the efficacy of those safety valves, in the dangerous operation of choosing a President of the United States. If we continue those two great federal features of our Constitution, without modification, the engine will not bear the force to be applied; the steam will become irresistible; we shall increase the pressure, till we burst the boiler.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) who was lately in favor of the resolutions reported by the committee, has become reconciled to the great federal feature of our Constitution, by which the small States may completely control the large, in the election of a President—at which I marvel much. If that gentleman will agree that a bare majority of the Representatives of thirteen small States, consisting of thirty-one members, less than the number of Representatives from his own State, shall have power to choose a President, against the will of one hundred and eighty-two Representatives, will he not give them the power to support the President they may thus choose? The power that can create and appoint, should be the power to uphold and defend. Otherwise, there can be no consistency, permanency, or safety, to the Government. Will that gentleman agree that the supplies necessary for the support of the Government and the Administration, shall be granted by the House of Representatives, voting by States? Will he consent to a rule, that, in case the two Houses of Congress disagree as to the subjects from which our revenues shall be raised, the objects upon which our treasures shall be expended, the case shall be decided by the House of Representatives, voting by States? This might be highly gratifying to the small States, could it be permanent. But it is evident that such a state of things could not exist for a single year. And yet some gentlemen are reconciled to a system by which a minority of the House of Representatives, as small, by possibility, as thirty-one, out of two hundred and thirteen, and, by probability, as about sixty-six, out of two hundred and thirteen; while not a dollar can be appropriated for the support of such a President, without the concurring votes of majorities in both Houses of Congress. A President elected by a minority, must be overwhelmed by opposition.

The small States, in the House of Representatives, can choose a President against the voice of the large, and an attempt to alter the relative power of the States, in this particular, even with their own consent, for it cannot be otherwise, is considered as a deadly blow at the power of the small States—a power necessary to their existence. Is it necessary to the existence of the small States, that they should possess a power, under any circumstances, to impose a President upon the United States, against the voice of six-sevenths, or even against the voice of a majority of the people? Is it necessary to their existence that they should have more weight in such an election than their federal numbers would give them? The exercise of this extraordinary power of choosing a President, in the House of Representatives, has occurred but once in six and thirty years, and even that afforded no peculiar advantages to the small States. On the contrary, it put in jeopardy their very existence. A combination among six of the large States can completely control the residue of the States upon the election of President by the Electors, and this power may be called into operation every four years, and may be continued without interruption, as long as those States can agree as to their dividends, while the small States can only come in for a casual exercise of their extraordinary power, when the great States disagree among themselves, and which has happened but once since the establishment of our Government. This power, however, which may be casually exercised by the small States, must and will lead to combinations among the large States, to prevent a resort to the House of Representatives; a regard to their own interests imposes upon them the necessity of such combinations; an anomalous case of a necessity on the part of the strong to combine against the weak.

Of what advantage is this power to the small States, which has been exercised but once since the establishment of our Government, and was then considered as a great calamity? There can be none. What advantage can there be in retaining a power which it will be dangerous to exercise? None. Ambitious individuals in the small States may casually derive an importance from their situation, in the exercise of this power, but this can be of no importance to the people of the States to which such individuals may belong.

There is a power, however, vested in the small States, beyond their numerical strength, upon which their existence depends—their equal vote in the Senate of the United States. But this is a power, not to give the small States an undue influence in the choice of a President, not to enable them to impose laws upon the large States, but a preventive power—a power to arrest the progress of laws which might infringe their rights or interests. It is a species of veto, by which the Senators of twelve States, however small the population of those States, can effectually prevent the passing of any law which they may think against their interests. Without this power, the small States must immediately fall a prey to the large. Whether this principle of veto should have been carried further by the Constitution, it is unnecessary now to inquire. Fortunately, there is one point on which this principle of veto rests in a single State—it is for the preservation of that sacred part of our Constitution—the equal vote of the States in the Senate; the only part which is put beyond the reach of alteration. By the 5th article of the Constitution, no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate; and, as no amendment to the Constitution can take place, which will not apply equally to all the States, it is evident that the small States never can lose this right, unless they unanimously consent to it. All the fears, therefore, of the gentleman from Missouri, that the small States, by giving up a portion of power in choosing a President, shall endanger their equal vote in the Senate, are without foundation. While a single principle of the Constitution is left, this right will remain inviolate.

But what is this deadly blow aimed at the power of the small States? Simply a proposition that, if the large States will yield up the power by which they can completely suppress the voice of the small States in the first trial, on a Presidential election, the small States will so far give up their control in the last resort, as to choose a President by a joint vote of the two Houses of Congress; in which they reserve the extra power which the federative principle in our National Legislature gives them. This body—the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress—would be precisely analogous to the whole body of Electors, if assembled at Washington; the same number, of the same political principles, with the same views and interests, enjoying, in an equal degree, the confidence of their constituents, equally honest, patriotic, intelligent, and trust-worthy. But the gentleman from South Carolina says this would be to choose the President by the National Legislature, which would lead to a dissolution of the Union. And is it true that the fate of the Union would be less safe in the hands of both Houses of Congress than in those of one of its branches? I hope the President may always be chosen by the Electors. I dread a resort to Congress on this subject, under any circumstances; but, if such a resort must be had, it is surely more safe in the hands of both Houses of Congress, than in those of either House singly.

The gentleman from South Carolina seems to think the proposition now offered a perfectly novel one. True, it has never before been presented as an amendment to the Constitution; but it is as old as the Constitution itself. On the 17th July, 1787, it was agreed unanimously, in the Federal Convention, that the President should be elected by the National Legislature; and for a long time this was thought the safer mode, even in the first instance of choosing a President, by this enlightened and patriotic assembly of statesmen, some of whom, at least, entertain no hostility to the power of the small States. It was not then discovered that such an election would endanger the existence of the Union.

The gentleman from South Carolina thinks there would be great danger from the influence of the departments of the Government, and of the Executive, upon the two Houses of Congress, in their choice of a President. But, would not this influence operate as strongly, nay, much more so, upon the House of Representatives, voting as States upon that question, under the present system? The gaining one member of the joint meeting, would be no more than gaining one vote out of two hundred and sixty-one, while the gaining one member in the House of Representatives might be gaining a twenty-fourth part of the whole. When a State has but one Representative, this would be obviously the case, as it would be, when the Representatives of a State should be so divided as that the change of one would give the vote of the State to one candidate or to the other—so that, by possibility, the gaining of thirteen votes might change the fate of a Presidential election; take it from one candidate, and give it to another. In the latter case, the danger would be truly formidable; in the former, it would be no greater than resorting a second time to the Electors.

While the honorable gentleman charges me with aiming a deadly blow at the power of the small States, how stands his own account with those small States? Has he not aimed a deadly blow at their power? By the Constitution, if no one of the Presidential candidates shall receive a majority of the votes of all the Electors, the House of Representatives, voting by States, shall choose the President from the candidates having the highest number of votes, not exceeding three. The moment, therefore, that it is ascertained that no one of the candidates has received the votes of a majority of the Electors, the right is complete in the small States to control the election. It is guaranteed to them by one of the great federal features of the Constitution. It is a right precious in the eyes of the ambitious men of the small States; and shall the friends of the small States endeavor to divest them of this casual but highly valued right? The gentleman proposes that, in case of no election by Electors in the first instance, the case shall be sent back to those Electors. He wishes to provide that the election of a President shall, in no event, devolve upon the House of Representatives. He seems to have no other object in view, in his proposition; but to deprive the small States of this power. He is for giving it up without a consideration. He does not even ask any corresponding concession on the part of the great States. Instead of leaving the election to the House of Representatives, when Delaware would have an equal vote with New York, he sends it back to the College of Electors, in which the vote of New York would be to that of Delaware as 12 to 1.

Although I esteem this casual power of the small States, in electing a President in the House of Representatives, of no advantage to them, for one, I would never consent to yield it, without obtaining, at the same time, an equal cession of power on the part of the great States.

These great Federal features of the Constitution have become enormous excrescences, owing their growth to circumstances not foreseen by the members of the Federal Convention; among others, to the unparalleled increase of population in some of the great States, and the admission of eleven new States. These excrescences must be reduced equally and simultaneously. The balance must be more nicely adjusted, or the equilibrium will be forever lost.

Although we cannot expect any final vote on the propositions now under consideration, at this session, we might have a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, proposing to dispense with the agency of Electors. This amendment has been very fully and ably argued on the part of that gentleman, and I would now attempt to answer him; but this would be an unnecessary consumption of time, provided the Senate is now disposed to postpone, indefinitely, all the amendments offered. If the decision should be against the postponement, I shall still have the opportunity of making the observations which I should now offer.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, said he was opposed to the district system, because it had a tendency to deprive all the States, great and small, of a portion of their power, and because it interfered with the separate character of the States, as independent sovereignties. He illustrated this view of the subject by several remarks, and then proceeded to state that he concurred in the opinion that had been expressed in debate, that the district system was calculated to bring the election of President into the House of Representatives. Mr. T. fully concurred in the views of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) that great evils would arise from the constant interference of Congress in the Presidential election, and that any amendment to the Constitution would be very objectionable which would have the effect of making that interference more frequent. He said it had been a great object with him for many years to effect some amendment to the Constitution, which might secure the election of the President, without troubling Congress with it. He might not live to see that desirable object accomplished, but he hoped the gentleman from South Carolina would.

As to the question of a Congressional caucus for the nomination of candidates for the Presidency, Mr. T. said, he never had any doubt that such a nomination was a clear violation of the spirit of the Constitution. On that subject, he believed, his sentiments were in print. It appeared to him preposterous for gentlemen to contend that, in making such a nomination, they acted in their private capacities. Mr. T. here entered into some arguments to prove that members of Congress could not meet at the Seat of Government and nominate a candidate for the Presidency, without making it a public business. The people would so regard it, and it would produce the same effect as if the nomination was made by members in their legislative capacities.

His honorable friend and colleague (Mr. BARBOUR) had stated that he (Mr. TAYLOR) had been his instructor in respect to caucusing, and that he had introduced him into the first caucus he ever attended. His colleague, if he had received any instructions from him on the subject, had certainly profited greatly by them. He had been a very apt scholar in his lessons, and had far outstripped his master. But his colleague was greatly mistaken. He had never attended a caucus, either in Congress or elsewhere, for the purpose of nominating candidates for offices. Such proceedings he considered very dangerous, and altogether unconstitutional.

The meeting to which the gentleman had alluded was held by some of the members of the Virginia Legislature, for the single purpose of preparing resolutions to be proposed in the Legislature. Mr. T. said he did not agree with the gentlemen on the other side, that informal meetings for preparing bills or resolutions to be proposed to legislative bodies had any resemblance to a Congressional caucus, intended to transfer from the States their Constitutional check and influence in the election of a President to Congress. It had been said, indeed, that a Congressional caucus acted only in their private characters. To illustrate this assertion: we have all heard of what is called a bull dance. Suppose sixty or seventy of the gravest and most respectable private citizens should assemble and entertain the spectators with jigs, rigadoons, and hornpipes, would not their private characters be estimated in contemplating the exhibition? But, if the same number of members of Congress should assemble and exhibit a similar scene, would not their public characters be also estimated? So, when assembled for nominating a President, it is their public characters, and those only, which are intended to influence the election; and such an influence destroys that of the States, bestowed by the Constitution for self-preservation, by transferring to Congress a power conferred on the States. Their characters will follow them into a caucus, either for the purpose of a bull dance, or for nominating a President.

Mr. T. said that he had not previously mentioned the word caucus in this debate, nor should he have now done so, had he not been personally called upon; but that, if the resolutions for amending the Constitution should be taken up, it would be necessary to consider that subject, as having a tendency towards that consolidated and concentrated form of government towards which we were verging with awful rapidity. At this juncture, its thorough examination would produce an excitement inconsistent with a discreet consideration of the amendments; and therefore he concurred in the proposed postponement.

Mr. MILLS' stated the views which induced him to move for the indefinite postponement of this subject. He had believed that it was quite impossible to act upon these resolutions at the present session; that the public sentiment was not yet prepared for any amendment on this subject, and that a sufficient number of the Senate, to carry any one of these amendments, could not be induced to vote for any amendment. He thought the present was not the best time for the consideration of the subject, and that there were so many and so various propositions, that no one of them would be adopted at present.

Mr. KELLY, of Alabama, next took the floor, and began with observing that he would endeavor, so far as it was practicable, to withdraw the subject under debate from the fog with which it had been enveloped, and to conform to the rule of debate prescribed by the Chair. He remarked, that the whole discussion on this caucus question, had arisen from a want of forbearance on the part of the gentlemen who had advocated that measure. The gentleman from New York (Mr. KING) had been charged with a change of opinion on the subject of the Constitutional amendments, and had risen in his defence, and justified his disposition to delay acting on the subject at this crisis, on account of the central power which now presumed to select candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency of the United States. Whether he actually used the cabalistic and portentous word, caucus, or not, I hold it, said Mr. K., immaterial. He certainly spoke of a central power, that had arisen in this Government, not known to the Constitution, and unfriendly to the liberties of the nation; and whether he called it a caucus or not, he certainly did, said Mr. K., assure the gentlemen that he had no unfriendly feelings towards any person who differed from him in opinion. Now, said Mr. K., this remark was received with the most extraordinary sensitiveness on the part of these gentlemen; they had, with an ultra chivalrous esprit du corps, immediately rushed into a contest on the caucus question, and had entered into arguments in support of that measure. Mr. K. repeated, that a very small portion of forbearance, in that stage of the debate, would have prevented the discussion altogether; but, as gentlemen had thought proper to assume a different course, it had certainly become necessary that their remarks should be answered and their arguments refuted. This had been done by the gentleman from South Carolina, in respect to the arguments which were urged on the other side, before he addressed the Senate. But other arguments had still been advanced, and to these, Mr. K. said, he would now proceed to reply. Waiving, for the present, the Constitutional question, he would notice the argument of the necessity of a caucus, as a party measure. Now, without arguing how far a caucus could be justified on that ground, he would say that such a measure could certainly not be justified as a party measure, where only a small minority could be got to unite in it. He had always understood that the very first principle of the Republican party, to which he belonged, was, that a majority only could act or speak for the party, and this, indeed, seemed to be a sacred principle, that could in no case be disregarded. But the gentlemen of the present day have conquered the difficulty that embarrassed Archimedes: when he stood a solitary Colossus on the vortex of mechanical science, he exclaimed, "Give me a place to stand, and I'll move the world." Gentlemen have stricken from this sentence the "dos pou sto," and the article "kai," and retain only the "ton kosmon kinezo." They now propose to raise the world without a fulcrum—here Mr. K. was called to order by the Chair. The PRESIDENT said that, in his opinion, the debate had, on the former days, assumed a much wider range than the strict rules of order would authorize; he himself was not then in the chair; and that he conceived it to be his duty, at this point, to confine the discussion to the precise question before the Senate. Mr. KELLY said, it was his intention to have replied to some of the opinions heretofore expressed in debate, in favor of the meeting alluded to; but, as the Chair had decided that it was not in order to do so, he should submit to the decision, and take his seat.

Mr. BARBOUR, who was in the chair when the discussion alluded to commenced, felt it his duty to explain the reasons which had induced him to allow a wider latitude to that debate than had been indicated to be proper, by the Chair, at this time. It was in consequence of his peculiar situation, in connexion with that meeting, that he had refrained from calling gentlemen to order, who had introduced its discussion. He considered that it was better that the liberty of debate should be sometimes abused, than that it should be curtailed—the more especially, as every gentleman stood answerable before the country for any remarks he might make in this Senate.

After the lapse of a few minutes, and after another gentleman had risen to speak, the VICE PRESIDENT observed, that the gentleman from Alabama was entitled to the floor, if he chose to progress.

Mr. KELLY then rose, and observed, that he understood himself to have been deprived of the floor by the decision of the Chair. To which the VICE PRESIDENT replied, that the merits of the question before the Senate might be discussed, and that the gentleman might progress. Mr. KELLY then observed, that he would not attempt to evade the decision of the Chair, and that if he could not be permitted to reply to political doctrines preached here for home consumption, he had no wish to speak.

Mr. BRANCH, of North Carolina, asked the indulgence of the Senate for the purpose of submitting, for their consideration, a few thoughts in relation to the important subject-matter under discussion. He said it was due to the State he had the honor in part to represent, for him to support the amendment to the Constitution, which proposes to establish a uniform mode for the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President, and to himself, to oppose the indefinite postponement of the various propositions now pending. With the sentiment of the Legislature of the State, he most heartily concurred.

In entering on the subject, he said that he should endeavor to conform to the decision of the Chair, and that he would not intentionally bring into discussion matter foreign from the true question before the Senate—for he firmly believed that the decision of the presiding officer was correct, and ought to be enforced.

It would become necessary for him, however, to animadvert on the Constitution as it as present, and to call the attention of the Senate to the pernicious practices which had obtained and grown up under it, which threatened, ultimately, to subvert the liberties of the people. It was the duty of an able surgeon to probe the wound to the bottom, that he might be the better enabled to devise and apply an effective remedy.

It would not be denied, he said, that it was the intention of the Convention which framed the Constitution to give to the people the election of their Chief Magistrate. But what have we been told by my highly esteemed friend and colleague, (Mr. MACON,) who is certainly high authority? Why, that the President had, since the days of General WASHINGTON, been always elected by Congress.

This, said Mr. B., is the most alarming declaration, and surely it becomes necessary that something should be done to prevent that from taking place in future. The Constitution provides, that the President shall be elected by the people, through their Electors; but we find that a plan has been found out, setting aside this provision—the President is to be chosen, and the people are called upon only to conform to the will of their rulers. Now, if these unconstitutional proceedings are to be continued, and the President hereafter is to be chosen by Congress acting in caucus, it is manifest that the Constitution will not only be practically altered, but that a door will be opened to the greatest abuses and corruption. We will soon find that the President will be chosen only by means of intrigue and management with the members of Congress.

Is not the mischief, therefore, abundantly evident? Either make some alteration, so as to give efficiency to the vote of the people, or let them no longer be deluded with the fallacious idea that they exercise the power themselves. It is not worth while to disguise the fact from ourselves. We all see it. Indeed, it must be manifest to the most superficial observer, that the different departments of the Government, instead of acting as checks on each other, are naturally drawn to play into each other's hands; particularly the Executive and Congress. The gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKERSON,) to whom I have listened with much pleasure, has failed to assign any reason why it is unsafe to return the election to the Electors. I must therefore presume, said Mr. B., that none exists.

Let us, then, said Mr. B., throw off this usurped authority, and return to the people the rights of which they have been wrongfully shorn. From whence do the members of Congress derive the power to elect the President of the United States? I hazard nothing, said Mr. B., in saying that the power is not to be found in the Constitution, and that it is, consequently, an encroachment upon the sovereignty of the people: the more alarming, inasmuch as it is exercised in the corrupt atmosphere of Executive patronage and influence. Make me President, and I will make you a Minister, a Secretary, or, at all events, I will provide you with a good berth, suited to your wants, if not to your capacity. And thus we shall barter away the rights and privileges of the people, at the expense of the best interests of the country, and the charter of our liberties. The mischief is abundantly manifest. Let us not, then, turn a deaf ear to the admonitions of duty, and the voice of an enlightened community, but rather let us have the magnanimity to return—to leave the things which belong to the Constitution, even though, in doing so, we part with some of our influence. The President and Congress were intended, by the wise framers of our Constitution, to act as checks, each upon the other; but, by the system at present practised, they lose the benefit of this salutary provision. For, as has been observed by my honorable colleague, the Congress have always made the President, and will continue to do it. Yes, sir, the voice of that orthodox and experienced statesman has said so, and I have no reason to doubt the correctness of his assertion.

It ought not to be said, observed Mr. B., that we are incapable of acting on this important subject calmly and dispassionately. Our present session is comparatively unlimited—it is, in truth, the long session—our table is not burdened with important business; we sit but two or three hours in the day, and but five days out of the week; this objection cannot, therefore, be sustained. And as to the Senate of the United States, composed of gentlemen advanced in years, possessing a character, and justly, too, for their discretion and intelligence, being hurried away by passion or excitement, I cannot, said Mr. B., believe it for a moment. We are all convinced that no alteration can be made in time to affect the approaching Presidential election. Hence, whatever excitement may be felt, it will not be of a pernicious character, but will rather tend to elicit the best and most effectual remedy. If we suffer the present propitious moment to pass by, what may we expect? Why, sir, that the nation will again fall into a state of apathy, and that nothing will be done until the people are again called on to elect another Chief Magistrate, when we shall have to deprecate the recurrence of all the mischief at present complained of, and which threatens such alarming consequences to the peace and security of society.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, rose, in reply to Mr. DICKERSON, and said, that he should certainly have availed himself of the present occasion to reply to the additional argument urged on the other side on the now forbidden topic, but the decision of the President (to which he was disposed to bow with reverence) would induce him to confine his remarks strictly to the Constitutional question. On that subject it was necessary he should say a few words in reply to the honorable gentleman from New Jersey. That gentleman had treated the subject as if the question was, whether the President should, on all occasions hereafter, be elected by the House of Representatives, voting by States, or by the joint ballot of the Senate and House of Representatives; and he had endeavored to show that the latter was the preferable mode. If that, said Mr. H., be admitted to be the question, he would have no hesitation in adhering to the vote by States—because, the Constitution having made that provision in favor of the small States, he could perceive no reason or propriety in calling on them to surrender the privilege merely for the purpose of increasing the power of the large States. Power was of more importance to the former than it could be to the latter, and where the Constitution had confided it, he presumed it ought not to be surrendered except for the purpose of obtaining some essential benefit either to themselves or to the country at large. But the gentleman informs us that the election of the President by the National Legislature cannot be objectionable, because the journals of the Convention prove that the great men who framed the Constitution did, at one stage of their deliberations, actually agree to that mode of appointment; though they afterwards changed their opinion, and thus (contrary to the usual authority of precedents) a final decision against a measure is considered by the gentleman as an argument in its favor. It is true, said Mr. H., that it was proposed in the Convention to elect the President by the National Legislature, and this proposition was at first agreed to; but the evils of that system soon began to be understood; it lost friends almost daily; and, after the mature deliberation of several months, the plan was finally abandoned—only two States voting for it. A short time afterwards, the Constitution, in its present form, providing for the election of a President by Electors, was unanimously adopted. If this plan had been hastily adopted, and without comparing it with others, it might be supposed that it had not received the deliberate sanction of the Convention. But, when it appears that, during a period of several months, the wisest assembly that ever met in council were deliberating on the question, whether an election by the National Legislature or by Electors was to be preferred; when it is found that all their doubts were finally removed, and that they became thoroughly convinced there was great danger to be apprehended from permitting Congress to interfere in the choice of the President, their final adoption of the Electoral system, under such circumstances, was a triumphant authority against an election by the National Legislature. The gentleman from New Jersey, relying on his precedent, has not attempted to answer the argument which Mr. H. had urged against his proposition. He had not ventured to deny that the district system, in itself, had a tendency to produce a failure of the election, and to bring it into Congress. Taking this, then, as admitted, the gentleman from New Jersey had very naturally considered himself as called upon, in defence of his propositions, to prove that the election of the President by Congress would be free from objection. But, said Mr. H., has he succeeded in doing this? Mr. H. had, on a former occasion, contended that the interference of the members of Congress in the Presidential election, whether they voted by States or by polls—whether they voted in their legislative or any other capacity, must always be attended with great danger to the liberties of the country; that it would be destructive of the purity of legislation, confound the separate departments of the Government, expose to temptation, to intrigue, and finally to corruption, the representatives of the people; and that it was against these evils the Constitution was intended to guard. None of these arguments has the gentleman answered; but he turns from the subject, and alleges that my proposition (said Mr. H.) aims as fatal a blow at the rights of the small States as his own, and triumphantly asks, “if I am prepared to surrender any power of the small States without an equivalent, without a price, and adds, that he is not willing to do so.” Now, said Mr. H., the proposition I have submitted, has for its object to effect the election of the President by the people, and to keep it entirely out of the hands of Congress. If this involved the surrender of the contingent power of the small States to elect the President by States, in the event of the failure of the election by the people, that surrender was founded on the belief that, to elect the President by the people, was to carry into effect the true intention of the Constitution, and to avoid evils of very great magnitude, which must result from an election by Congress.

Mr. HAYNE said he was satisfied that the small States, from their devotion to the Union, would be unwilling to give up the contingent power alluded to, provided a plan could be devised by which the choice of the President, by the Electors, could be secured; and they would do this “without any equivalent,” except that which would be derived from promoting the permanent prosperity and glory of the country. He was persuaded that the patriotic State he had the honor in part to represent would prefer that the President should, in all cases, be chosen by the Electors, than that he should be chosen by the House of Representatives, voting even by States. To keep that election from Congress, (an election which, with its attendant circumstances, could not but disturb the harmony and impair the purity of that body,) the small States would, he was confident, be found willing to unite in an amendment of the Constitution. But, if the course of legislation was to be disturbed, and Congress are to elect the President, the small States never would, and never ought to, consent to change the mode of voting. They would, from their devotion to liberty, make a sacrifice of a portion of their power on the altar of their country; but they would never make it merely to add to the power of others. The difference, then, said Mr. H., between the gentleman from New Jersey and himself consisted in this—the gentleman was willing to surrender the power of voting for a President by States, and was disposed to accept in lieu of it a joint ballot of the Senate and House of Representatives; while Mr. H., on the other hand, was unwilling to make that surrender, unless the choice of the President by the people could be secured, without any possible interference by Congress. Mr. H. said he was satisfied that the State he represented, and the small States generally, would never be tempted to wish that the election of a President should fail, even though their influence in the election might thereby be increased. This was the principle on which he was prepared to act. It did not appear to him to be impracticable so to amend the Constitution as to secure an election by the Electors. In the event of a failure at the first ballot, let them be required to make a second attempt, under such circumstances as will secure an election. He saw no insuperable difficulty in arranging the details of such a plan. But, if the gentleman could show that the plan was wholly impracticable, and the election cannot, by any means, be kept out of Congress, then, Mr. H. said, he would be compelled to come to the conclusion, that the Constitution must remain as it is, until further experience shall suggest a remedy for the evils we are destined to suffer. One thing he considered certain, that the small States never would consent to change the present mode of election in the House of Representatives for any other in which Congress should have any concern, however they might be disposed to unite in any plan which would effect the choice of the Chief Magistrate by the unbiassed suffrages of the people.

Mr. DICKERSON replied, that he had not misunderstood the gentleman. He had not supposed his argument in favor of an election of a President by the House of Representatives, but exactly the reverse. When, however, the operations of the resolutions reported, are considered, it ought to be with reference to the Constitution as it now stands. Is it more safe to trust the two Houses of Congress, voting by joint ballot, with the election of President, or to trust the House of Representatives alone, voting by States? The proposition of the gentleman, to send the election back to the Electors, after their first ballot shall have failed, is subject to insuperable objections, as may be shown when this point shall be considered. One decisive objection is, that no good could result from sending the question back to the men who had made up and expressed their minds upon the subject; who had decided, and, by their decision, precluded all reasonable hope of coming, by fair means, to a choice, by the requisite majority. But, if there were no objections of this character against this proposition, it would still be as much an abandonment of the rights of the small States, as a choice by the two Houses of Congress in the last resort; and much more so than is contemplated by the resolution reported, as that requires an equal concession of power on the part of the great States. Yet no suspicion can be entertained that the honorable gentleman has any unfriendly feelings towards the small States.

SENATE.

He considers the election of a President in the House of Representatives, under any circumstances, as an enormous evil, which he would remedy by making a sacrifice greater, perhaps, than may be found necessary, and certainly too great, if it is to be at the expense of the small States exclusively.

Mr. MAcon rose in explanation of the allusion made by his honorable colleague to his remark, that the President had always been, with the exception of General Washington, elected by Congress. He repeated the observation, with a firm conviction of its correctness, that this had been the case, and, in his opinion, it always would be the case. If the members of Congress did not act in caucus, they would influence the people in some other way. The people were always writing to the members to get their opinion upon the different candidates, and their opinions would have great effect. Mr. M. said he was willing to alter the Constitution, but Congress, said he, will elect the President, be the Constitution what it may.

The question was then put, on postponing the whole subject indefinitely, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Brown, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, Josiah S. Johnston, Kelly, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Seymour, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Branch, Dickerson, Elliott, Holmes of Maine, Lowrie, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, and Ware.

So it was resolved that the said resolution be indefinitely postponed.

TUESDAY, March 23.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of William Duane, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Colonel William Duane; which were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

Mr. HENRY JOHNSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of Treasury to cause the swamp lands in the State of Louisiana, belonging to the inhabitants of the parishes of Attakapas, Opelousas, and Avoyelles, to be surveyed, and separated from the public domains and private claims.

Mr. LOWRIE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill extending the benefit of copy-rights to the authors of paintings or drawings; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

In pursuance of notice given yesterday, Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, asked leave to introduce a joint resolution, to authorize the President of the United States to purchase of Rembrandt Peale an equestrian portrait of WASHINGTON; provided the same can be obtained for a sum not to exceed $5,000. Leave was accordingly granted. The resolution was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BROWN presented the resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, expressing, as their opinion, that further and more effectual measures should be adopted by Congress for the promotion and protection of American manufactures; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BROWN presented the resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law authorizing them to select and locate certain portions of the public lands within the State, for the use of schools, in conformity to the compact between that State and the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWN presented the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, recommending to Congress the consideration of a system providing for the gradual emancipation of persons of color, held in servitude in the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act giving the consent and sanction of Congress to a certain act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida," reported it without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Chitwood;" and it was postponed to Monday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the terms of holding the district court of the United States for the District of Illinois," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplementary to "An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia;" and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, presented the petition of Isaac Russell, praying a pension; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to amend the ordinance and acts of Congress for the government of the Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes," and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill in addition to the act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States; and, on motion, it was postponed to Tuesday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill declaring the consent of Congress to the revocation of certain parts of the ordinances therein mentioned; and, on motion, it was laid on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church parish; and, on motion, it was laid on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to amend the judicial system of the United States, and providing for the holding of circuit courts; and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. BENTON, directing the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the Indian title to lands on the south side of Lake Superior, supposed to contain valuable copper mines, was again read, and agreed to.

The bill to "abolish imprisonment for debt," was again taken up for consideration. Mr. VAN DYKE opposed an amendment in the fourth section of the bill, providing that the creditor shall have power to put questions to the debtor, to be answered on oath, respecting the disposition of his property. The bill was then postponed, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The bill from the House of Representatives "providing for the necessary surveys for roads and canals," was next taken up. Mr. BENTON proposed, by way of amendment to this bill, an entire new bill. The amendment was read, and the subject was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Thursday next.

The bill introduced by Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, and reported by the Committee on Public Lands, "for the relief of the heirs of Don Harpin de la Guatrais" was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. This bill proposes to relinquish the title to a certain tract of land in Louisiana, to the persons for whose relief it is drawn, they having held the Spanish titles to the same, the records of which have been destroyed by fire.

Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, stated the grounds upon which this claim was founded. Some remarks were made upon it, by Messrs. KING, of Alabama, CHANDLER, and EATON. The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, "supplementary to the several acts providing for the ascertaining of land claims, in the St. Helena and Jackson Districts, in the State of Louisiana," was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. The sum of $1,500, the annual salary to be allowed to the registers of the land offices, and the receivers of public moneys, to be appointed under this act, was stricken out, and a motion was made to insert $800 in lieu of it. This amendment underwent some discussion, in relation to the duties to be performed by these officers, in which Messrs. H. JOHNSON, RUGGLES, KING, of Alabama, LOWRIE, and EATON, took part. On motion of Mr. H. JOHNSON, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill reported by the Committee on Claims,

"for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford," was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. This bill provides for the release of the petitioner from a judgment for $7,282 92, found against him, in favor of the United States. The petitioner was a deputy paymaster during the late war—previous to the settlement of his accounts with the proper department, his documents and vouchers were lost, by fire, in the city of New York. In consequence of this loss, he has since been unable to settle his accounts; and this judgment has been found against him, although he is not, in fact, indebted to the Government. Mr. RUGGLES stated the merits of this case; the bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, "for the relief of John McAlister, and the heirs of John Forbes," was next taken up in Committee of the Whole. This bill proposes to relinquish the title to a certain tract of land, to the persons for whose relief it is drawn; their individual titles to be ascertained and settled in a court of justice. The grounds of the bill were explained by Messrs. BARTON, and KING, of Alabama, and Mr. CHANDLER opposed it. It was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time, 17 to 14.

The bill introduced, some time since, by Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, "to provide for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States," was taken up, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

ARKANSAS BOUNDARY.

Mr. BENTON, from the select committee, to whom was referred, on the 17th December last, the memorial of the General Assembly of the Territory of Arkansas, made a report, accompanied by a bill to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas; which were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.—The report is as follows:

That the memorialists represent that the line, prescribed by an act of the last session of Congress, for the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, will pass through the counties of Miller and Crawford, and leave a proportion of the population of the said counties on the outside of said line and beyond the jurisdiction of said Territory; and they pray that the line may be altered, and fixed so far west as will include the residue of said counties and their inhabitants.

By information derived from the Delegate of said Territory, the committee are informed that the number of inhabitants thus cut off from the government under which they had lived, amounts to about twelve hundred souls; and the inquiries which present themselves, are: 1st. Whether the said inhabitants shall be left as they are, without law to govern them? 2d. or, Whether they shall be compelled to come within the present limits of the Territory? 3d. or, Whether the western boundary shall be extended to include them?

The first alternative the committee reject, for reasons too obvious to require specification. To the second, many objections are found, arising from the organized state of the counties; the claims which many of the inhabitants set up for pre-emption rights, under the act of Congress of the 12th of April, 1814; and, above all, from the fact, that, by an order issued from the War Department, the 15th December, 1818, a line drawn from the source of the Koamichi, to the source of the Poteau, was fixed as the limit of western settlements in Arkansas, and settlers west of that line were ordered to be removed to the east of it; in the execution of which order, by the commanding officer of Fort Smith, on the Arkansas river, the settlers in the now counties of Miller and Crawford were not removed, because found to be on the eastern side of the said line. The third alternative is, therefore, adopted by the committee, as well for the reasons growing out of the objections to the first and second, as because a line further west will divide into two equal parts the territory of the United States upon the Arkansas, east of the Mexican boundary, and will give to the future State of Arkansas that power and magnitude, to which, as a frontier State, in relation both to a foreign nation and numerous Indian tribes, it will be justly entitled.

The adjustment of the Indian boundary lines not being a subject of legislation, the committee do not make any report upon the existing boundary between the Choctaws and white settlers in the Territory of Arkansas. They leave that subject to the operation of treaties made or to be made, and report a bill solely for the extension of the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas.

WEDNESDAY, March 24.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1824," reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. LOWRIE laid on the table a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, enclosing statements showing the quantity of land surveyed, the quantity remaining unsold, the estimated quantity to be surveyed in each district, and the amount of money due from individuals on the 31st December, 1820, and the 30th September, 1821 and 1822; and also the quantity sold, and amount of purchase money under the credit and cash systems, respectively, and the quantity relinquished under the act of 1821, with the amount for which it sold. The letter and statements were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Charles S. Hempstead, and others, members of the bar in Missouri, reported a bill to alter the times of holding the District Courts in the District of Missouri; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to establish a Surveyor General's Office in the Territory of Arkansas; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public

Lands, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the appointment of a Surveyor General of the lands of the United States for the State of Louisiana, and one Surveyor General of the lands of the United States for the State of Mississippi, reported it without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. RUGGLES, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Demas Deming.

Mr. HAYNE presented the remonstrance of Thos. Carr, and others, in behalf of the citizens of Georgetown, South Carolina, against the passage of the bill now before Congress, to increase the duties on imports; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill releasing to John McAlister, or the legal representatives of John Forbes, a certain tract of land, was read the third time and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, to direct the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of causing certain swamp lands in Louisiana to be surveyed; and, it was ordered to lie on the table.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1824," with the several amendments proposed thereto by the Committee on Finance in the Senate.

The several amendments proposed in the details of the bill, were taken up, in course. The committee propose to reduce the appropriation agreed to in the House, for surveying the public lands of the United States, from $100,000 to $60,000. A discussion took place upon the propriety of reducing this item; in which Messrs. SMITH, LOWRIE, RUGGLES, H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, HOLMES, of Maine, CHANDLER, WILLIAMS, HAYNE, and EATON, engaged. The amendment was adopted.

The next amendment was, to strike out the amount of $1,160, "for improving the Capitol square, and painting the railing round the same," and insert in lieu thereof the sum of $3,000. Mr.

SMITH explained the reasons for proposing this increase. Messrs. MACON, and HOLMES, of Maine, made some few remarks upon the subject; and the amendment was then carried.

The committee propose to amend the bill, by inserting a new clause as follows: "for graduating and improving the grounds attached to the President's House, $2,000." This was also agreed to.

The committee recommend that the sum of $40,000, "for the relief of the sick, disabled, and destitute seamen, in foreign countries," should be stricken out, and $30,000 inserted for that purpose. This amendment was adopted.

They also recommend that the appropriation "for the Consul General at Paris, $2,000," be stricken out entirely. This amendment was supported by Messrs. SMITH, KING, of New York, and HOLMES, of Maine, and opposed by Messrs. PARROTT, LLOYD, of Massachusetts, and LOWRIE. The discussion turned upon the question, whether this officer was necessary, or not. The amendment was lost.

The next amendment proposes to strike out $18,000, the sum appropriated "for the payment of the salaries of the Commissioner and Arbitrator, under the 1st article of the Treaty of Ghent, and half the salaries of their Secretary and Messenger;" and to insert, in lieu thereof, the sum of $2,500, together with the unexpended balance of the last year's appropriation. Mr. SMITH stated the reasons which induced the committee to propose this reduction. Mr. KING, of New York, moved to insert, also, "an agent" to be connected with this commission, and spoke in support of the propriety of having a public agent before the commissioners. Mr. SMITH opposed this motion; and, in the course of his remarks, he stated that he had been informed, by a gentleman who acted as agent for individual claimants, in Virginia and Maryland, that the amount recovered, for slaves taken from those two States, would not be sufficient to pay the expenses of the commission. Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, also opposed the motion for the insertion of an agent, and Mr. BARBOUR advocated it at much length, denying the statement of Mr. SMITH, and controverting and answering all the arguments of the opposers of the appropriation. Without taking the question, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 25.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred by a resolution of the Senate of the 23d instant, reported a bill to authorize the President to hold a treaty with the Indians owning the country on the south side of Lake Superior, for the purpose of extinguishing their title to certain districts supposed to contain valuable mines of copper; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1824," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill for the relief of Colonel William Duane; the bill to alter the times for holding the District Court in the district of Missouri; the bill for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt; and the bill to establish a Surveyor General's office in the Territory of Arkansas, were, severally, read the second time.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill from the other House, "making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1821," with the several amendments proposed thereto, by the Committee on Finance of the Senate, was again taken up in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Finance propose to amend the bill, by striking out the sum of $18,000, appropriated "for the payment of the salaries of the Commissioner and Arbitrator, under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, half the salary of their Secretary, and half the contingent expenses of said commission;" and to insert in lieu thereof, the sum of $2,500, together with the unexpended balance of the last year's appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. KING, of New York, yesterday moved to amend this amendment, by including, in this item, a provision for a "public agent," to take care of the claims before this commission. That motion being under consideration, when the Senate adjourned yesterday, the question again recurred upon it. Mr. SMITH made some further remarks, in opposition to the motion. It was opposed, also, by Messrs. VAN DYKE, HOLMES, of Maine, NOBLE, and MACON; and supported by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, EATON, H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, BARBOUR, KING, of New York, and HAYNE.

Mr. KING, of New York, observed that the gentleman from Delaware having inquired by what authority the proposed agent was appointed, and what is the nature of the appointment, he would state the opinion which he entertained on the subject. The agency in question having no connexion with the Legislature or the Judiciary, he conceived it to be wholly of an Executive character, proceeding from, and having relation to the Executive power, which, by the Constitution, is vested in the President of the United States. The President is authorized to nominate, and, by the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint ambassadors, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not, by the Constitution, otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. The enumerated officers are created by the Constitution; various other officers of the United States are provided for by law. Executive services which from time to time may be requisite, and concerning which no law has made provision, from the beginning, have been performed by agents, appointed by the President alone. Should such appointments be made unnecessarily, and, in making them, it should be believed by the Congress that the Executive power is employed corruptly or improvidently, they will check such appointments by refusing to appropriate money to defray the expenses of them. Congress, in exercising such check, will act with the discretion and caution that the occasion calls for, manifesting the consideration and confidence which harmony between the co-ordinate departments of the Government requires.

Thus, soon after General WASHINGTON became President, Baron Steuben was sent to General Halderman, the Governor and Commander-in-chief of Canada, to ascertain whether he was authorized and prepared to deliver the northern posts, pursuant to the treaty of peace; and, upon General Halderman's declining to deliver them, Mr. Gouverneur Morris, then in Europe on his private business, was authorized by the President, General WASHINGTON, to proceed from France to England, to inquire of the English Ministry whether orders had been or would be sent to the Commander-in-chief in Canada to evacuate the American posts, according to treaty. The Baron Steuben and Mr. G. Morris were Executive agents on these occasions. Soon after the commencement of the war between France and Great Britain, the November Order of Council was issued in England, by which their armed vessels were instructed to detain, and send into port for adjudication, all American vessels employed in a trade which they were not permitted to carry on in peace; and the British ships of war detained American ships, and impressed their seamen in the West India seas. These proceedings induced President WASHINGTON to send Mr. Higginson, of Boston, to the West Indies, as an agent, to visit the British islands, and to obtain from the Courts of Admiralty copies of the decrees of condemnation of American vessels and cargoes, and to send these to the United States or to London. About the same time Captain Talbot, of the Navy of the United States was sent by General WASHINGTON, as an agent, to assist and recover the American seamen impressed into the British service. Captain Talbot proceeded to Jamaica, and other English islands, and afforded great assistance and protection to impressed American seamen.

Mr. Samuel Bayard was contemporaneously sent by General WASHINGTON, as an agent, to England, to enter, in the High Court of Admiralty, appeals from the colonial Admiralty Courts, to engage proctors to assist him, and to place in their hands the colonial decrees of condemnation of American vessels and cargoes. All of these agencies were derived from mere Executive appointments; they were faithfully executed, and contributed much to protect the rights and to secure the property of our countrymen.

After the treaty with Great Britain, of 1794, two sets of Commissioners met in America. One, concerning the river St. Croix, assembled at Halifax; another, concerning debts, convened at Philadelphia. A third set of Commissioners met at London. Concerning the debts, an agent was authorized by law to be appointed by the President and Senate, to be employed before the Philadelphia commission. Concerning the river St. Croix, an agent was appointed either by the President of the United States, or by the State of Massachusetts, that State being concerned in the settlement of this boundary. In respect to the London Commissioners, three successive agents were appointed by the President. The first, Mr. Bayard, by President WASHINGTON; the second, Mr. Samuel Cabot, by General WASHINGTON, or by his successor, Mr. Adams; the third, Mr. Erving, who superseded Mr. Cabot, by President Jefferson. These appointments, except the agent before the Philadelphia commission, were not made in pursuance of any law, but considered as Executive agencies, appointed and employed by the Executive alone.

Under Mr. Jefferson, or his successors, Mr. Poinsett, in South America; Mr. B. Provost, in Peru; Messrs. Rodney, Bland, and Breckenridge, at Buenos Ayres; Mr. Baptiste Irvine, at Caraccas; Mr. Tod, in Colombia, and Mr. Robinson in Mexico, have been employed as Executive agents, all being appointed by the Executive alone, no law creating their respective employment having been made. Each and all these agents have been paid out of the Treasury of the United States; appropriations for which must, from time to time, have been made.

Whether these agencies have been carried further than they ought to have been, Mr. K. could give no information; but no opposition is recollected to have been made to them. Within suitable limits, the power of the Executive to employ agents to obtain information, with which his office requires he should be furnished, will hardly be doubted; and the practice is the usage of all other nations, and has been that of the United States from the beginning, and under all the Presidents. The present agency is thought to be important, and useful to the States whose citizens lost their slaves; and, according to former precedents, this agency is well justified; it is deemed requisite by the Secretary of State, to whose Department the subject belongs; it has received the approbation of the American Commissioner and Arbitrator; and, as the average value of the lost slaves, the most important preliminary point, yet remains to be determined, the assistance of the agent continues to be useful, if not absolutely necessary. Should the agent be discontinued, the session of the Commissioners will be prolonged, and its expense thereby enlarged; so that the continuance of the agency will not only be of general utility, but a measure of positive economy.

The question on Mr. KING's motion was then put, and decided in the affirmative, 25 to 13. The discussion on this subject was continued till four o'clock. The yeas and nays were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Benton, Brown, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, Josiah S. Johnston, Kelly, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, McIlvaine, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Taylor of Virginia, and Ware—25.

FRIDAY, March 26.

Mr. NOBLE moved to discharge the Committee on Pensions from the consideration of the resolution of the 27th January, instructing said committee to inquire into the expediency of placing James Morrow upon the pension list; and, on motion by Mr. LOWRIE, the said motion was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN DYKE presented the memorial of Anthony C. Cazenove, and others, inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, remonstrating against a recession of that part of said District to the State of Virginia; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill to authorize the President to hold a treaty with the Indians owning the country on the south side of Lake Superior, for the purpose of extinguishing their title to certain districts supposed to contain valuable mines of copper, was read the second time.

The following Message was yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:
To the Senate of the United States:

Having stated to Congress, on the 7th of December last, that Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of New York, was entitled to a larger sum than that reported in his favor by the accounting officers of the Government, and that, in the execution of the law of the last session, I had the subject still under consideration, I now communicate to you the result.

On full consideration of the law by which this duty was enjoined on me, and of the report of the committee on the basis of which the law was founded, I have thought that I was authorized to adopt the principles laid down in that report, in deciding on the sum which should be allowed to him for his services. With this view, and on a comparison of his services with those which were rendered by other disbursing officers, taking into consideration, also, his aid in obtaining loans, I had decided to allow him five per cent. for all sums borrowed and disbursed by him, and of which decision I informed him. Mr. Tompkins has since stated to me that this allowance will not indemnify him for his advances, loans, expenditures, and losses, in rendering those services, nor place him on the footing of those who loaned money to the Government at that interesting period. He has also expressed a desire that I would submit the subject to the final decision of Congress, which I now do. In adopting this measure, I think proper to add, that I concur fully in the sentiments expressed by the committee in favor of the very patriotic and valuable services which were rendered by Mr. Tompkins in the late war.

JAMES MONROE.

MARCH 25, 1824.

The Message was read, and laid on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, as amended in Committee of the Whole; and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals;" and, on motion, it was postponed to Tuesday next.

Mr. H. JOHNSON gave notice that, on Monday next, he would ask leave to bring in a bill to provide for the sale of the warehouse at the former quarantine ground, near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling-house at the Balize, for the use of the boarding officer at that place, and for other purposes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill as reported by the Committee on Finance, "for the relief of Charles Gwynn, of Baltimore." This bill provides that a certain sum of money, overpaid into the Treasury of the United States, shall be refunded. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report on the petition of Thomas Hewes, of Louisiana, accompanied by a bill for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

The bill reported by the Committee on Claims, to provide for the settlement of the accounts of the late Benjamin Lincoln, David Humphreys, and Cyrus Griffin, was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. These gentlemen were appointed commissioners, thirty-five years since, to treat with the Creek Indians. Certain goods which were intrusted to them, as presents to the Indians, were not used for that purpose, but were afterwards applied to other objects. These goods still stand charged to the commissioners on the books of the Treasury. The persons have since deceased, and their legal representatives now petition that this charge may be cancelled. Messrs. RUGGLES and MILLS explained the circumstances attending this claim, and supported the bill, on the ground that the accounts had long since been fairly and honorably settled. Mr. CHANDLER made some remarks on the subject, to which Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, replied, and advocated the passage of the bill. The bill was then reported to the Senate, without amendment, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, in relation to certain acts of the Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, reported a bill, "confirming certain acts of James Miller, as Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes." The bill was twice read.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew; and it was laid on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; and it was laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, presented the memorial of Thomas Swann, and others, members of the bar in the District of Columbia, praying a change of the terms of the circuit court; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any Legislative act, on the part of the Congress of the United States, is necessary, to enable the inhabitants of the towns and villages in the State of Missouri, who may be entitled to a "common," adjacent to each town or village, to establish the boundaries of such "common," and to make such dispositions thereof as the interest of any such town or village may require.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the President to carry into effect the Treaty made at Ghent, on the 24th of December, 1814, excluding foreigners from trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States, and to preserve the fur trade within the limits of the said United States to American citizens; and, on motion, it was laid on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner; and it was laid on the table.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1824," was again resumed, in Committee of the Whole. The question was upon striking out the appropriation of $18,000, "for the salaries of commissioner, arbitrator, and an agent, under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, and half the salary of their secretary, and half the contingent expenses of said commission," and to insert in lieu thereof the sum of "$4,500," for that purpose. This was the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance of the Senate, as yesterday amended, on motion of Mr. KING, of New York. The amendment was agreed to.

An amendment was, also, agreed to, in relation to the amount appropriated for the compensation and travelling expenses of the members of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida.

The committee recommend to insert in the bill, a clause, as follows: "For a draughtsman, and two colorers, authorized by law to be employed in the General Land Office, $3,000." This was agreed to.

All the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance having been gone through with, Mr. SMITH moved that the bill be further amended by inserting this clause: "For the contingent expenses of the two Boards of Land Commissioners for East and West Florida, for the year 1824, including arrearages, $1,250." Messrs. SMITH, KING of Alabama, and LOWRIE, made some remarks upon this subject. The amendment was rejected.

The bill was then reported, from the Committee of the Whole, to the Senate, with the several amendments which had been agreed thereto.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, opposed the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, reducing the amount to be appropriated for the surveys of public lands. He concluded by moving to strike out $60,000, and insert $80,000, as the appropriation for that purpose. This motion was supported by Messrs. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, and SMITH, and opposed by Messrs. LOWRIE, HOLMES of Maine, and KING of Alabama. The question was divided. The sum of $60,000 was stricken out. The Senate refused, by the casting vote of the Chair, to insert $80,000. The blank was subsequently filled with $75,000.

Mr. LOWRIE opposed the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, by which the appropriation "to provide for sick, disabled, and destitute seamen, in foreign countries," was reduced from $40,000 to $30,000. Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, also spoke against that amendment; and the Senate refused to concur in it.

The other amendments were adopted, and the bill was then passed to a third reading, as amended; and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed. The bill afterwards, on motion of Mr. SMITH, and by general consent, was read the third time, passed, and sent to the other House for concurrence in the amendments.

MONDAY, March 29.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the memorial of Elijah Van Syckel, reported a bill for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the trustees of the town of St. Charles, in Missouri, reported a bill supplementary to an act of Congress passed on the 13th day of June, 1812, entitled "An act making further provision for settling the claims to lands in the Territory of Missouri;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. McILVAINE presented the memorial of Joshua Brick, and others, of Port Elizabeth, and of John S. Howell, and others, of Gloucester county, in New Jersey, severally praying an increase of the duty on imported iron, and on the manufactures thereof. The memorials were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Hewes was read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of the 26th instant, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire whether any legislative act is necessary, to enable the inhabitants of towns in Missouri entitled to a "common," to establish the boundary thereof, and to dispose of the same in such manner as the interests of the towns may require; and agreed thereto.

The bill for the relief of Charles Gwynn, of Baltimore, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Benjamin Lincoln, and others, was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, on motion, it was postponed to Wednesday next.

Mr. HENRY JOHNSON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the sale of the warehouse at the former quarantine ground near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling house at the Balize, in the said State, for the use of the boarding officer at that place, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BROWN gave notice that he would ask leave, to-morrow, to bring in a bill to change the terms of the Circuit and District Courts in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the Circuit Court in Kentucky.

PORTRAIT OF COLUMBUS, &c.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the select committee, appointed on the 11th December last, on the distribution of the rooms of the centre building of the Capitol, to whom was referred a communication from the Secretary of State of the 2d January last, reported resolutions providing a place of deposit for the portrait of Columbus, and directing the distribution of certain copies of the Declaration of Independence now in the Department of State; which was read, and passed to a second reading.—The report is as follows:

That the Committee have had under consideration the following letter of the Secretary of State, which was referred to them:

"To the President of the Senate:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 1, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, a copy of a letter, received at this Department, from George G. Barrell, Consul of the United States at Malaga, and of informing you, that the picture mentioned in it, is at the office of this Department, subject to such disposal of it as Congress may direct.

Having been some time retained at New York, to which place it was shipped by Mr. Barrell, it has very recently been received here, in a frame, upon which is engraved the following inscription:

'COLUMBUS,'

'Presented to the nation by G. G. Barrell, United States' Consul at Malaga. The frame presented by Parker and Clover, picture framers, New York, A. D. 1823.'

I avail myself of this occasion to state, that an exact fac simile, engraved on copper plate, has been made by direction of this Department, of the original copy of the Declaration of Independence, engrossed on parchment, and signed by all the members of Congress, on the 2d of August, 1776, as appears by the secret journal of that day. Two hundred copies have been struck off from this plate, and are now at the office of this Department, subject to the disposal of Congress.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

The committee beg leave to report the following resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the picture mentioned in the foregoing letter of the Secretary of State be placed in the National Library.

Resolved, That the two hundred copies of the Declaration of Independence, now in the Department of State, be distributed in the manner following:

- 2 copies to each of the surviving signers of the Declaration of Independence;
 - 2 copies to the President of the United States;
 - 2 copies to the late President, Mr. Madison;
 - 2 copies to the Marquis de Lafayette;
 - 20 copies to the two Houses of Congress;
 - 12 copies to the different Departments of Government;
 - 2 copies for the President's House;
 - 2 copies for the Supreme Court room;
 - 1 copy to each of the Governors of the States, and 1 to each branch of the Legislatures of the States;
 - 1 copy to each of the Governors of the Territories of the United States, and
 - 1 copy to the Legislative Council of each Territory;
- And the remaining copies to the different Universities and Colleges of the United States, as the President of the United States may direct.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the distribution of the said copies of the Declaration of Independence to be made, agreeably to the foregoing resolution.

INDIAN FUR TRADE.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, "to enable the President to carry into effect the Treaty of Ghent, to prevent foreigners from trading with the Indians within the limits of the United States, and to secure the fur trade to the citizens of the said United States." Mr. ELLIOTT was called to the Chair. The bill having been read—

Mr. BENTON said that the provisions it contained were bottomed upon the fact, that foreigners instigated the Indians on the Upper Missouri to kill and pillage American citizens. To prevent these outrages, and save the fur trade to our own citizens, it was necessary to exclude these foreigners wholly from the dominions of the United States. As the chairman of the committee which reported the bill, it became his duty to sustain the views it presented; and, in doing so, he would recall to the recollection of the Senate that, from the day of our independence, the frontiers of the United States have been constantly harassed by the machinations of foreigners among the Indians within our own boundaries.

In the South, the instigations of the Spanish authorities, and the incitements of a foreign mercantile house in Pensacola, kept the Southern Indians at war with the Southern and Western States, with a few intermissions, for a period of forty years. It is only within four or five years past that these hostilities have ceased. The acquisition of the Floridas, by putting an end to the practices of foreigners, has given permanent peace to the Southern frontier.

The Northwest has presented a more extended theatre for the same kind of machinations. The Western posts were retained, from the peace of '83, in violation of the treaty of that date, until the year '96. The pretext for the retention was, the non-payment of debts claimed by the British merchants; the motive, to monopolize the fur trade, to retain the control of the Indians, and to check the progress of the Western settlements. The first of these motives was admitted in the year '89 by the Duke of Leeds and Mr. Pitt. The admission was made to Mr. Gouverneur Morris, authorized by President WASHINGTON to sound the British Ministry on the subject of restoring the Northwestern posts, and entering into a commercial treaty with the United States.—(Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. 5, p. 276.) The second were proclaimed by Lord Dorchester, Governor General of Canada, in the year '92—proclaimed under circumstances which admitted of no denial, in a public speech to prepare the Western Indians for a war with the United States. (American State Papers, vol. 2, p. 56.) British traders, protected by their Government, and incited by their own cupidity, succeeded in bringing on the great Indian war which desolated, for so many years, the frontiers of Kentucky and Ohio, overwhelmed two American armies with disastrous defeat, and was only terminated by the great victory of General Wayne in the year '94, on the Miami of the Lakes, in sight of a British garrison. This war was the fruit of the retention of the Northwestern posts in violation of the treaty of '83. The knowledge of this fact determined the American Government to procure, at any sacrifice, the surrender of these posts. The treaty of '94 effected this object, but left to British subjects the fatal privilege of entering our territories and trading with our Indians. The use which was made of this privilege is known to all America. Everywhere the British traders were engaged in poisoning the minds of the Indians, and inciting them to war and hatred against the Americans. A circular speech was composed, and sent among all the tribes, in which the Great Spirit was made to declare the British and Indians were his own children, and the Americans the children of the Evil Spirit—"that they grew from the scum of the great waters when it was troubled by the Wicked Spirit, and the froth was driven into the woods by a strong East wind."

By these arts, long before the declaration of the late war, the Indians were ripe for hostilities with us, and their formidable confederacy, inflamed by fanaticism, extended from the Lakes of Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. They would not even wait for the co-operation of their allies, but boldly began the war in the year 1811, upon the bloody field of Tippecanoe. In the three succeeding years, they occasioned the expenditure of millions of money, and the loss of thousands of lives. Massacres, the recital of which freeze the blood, were repeatedly perpetrated, and British traders led the attack, and presided at the slaughter of the wounded and the captive. Does any one doubt that these traders instigated these Indians to begin the war? Let him read the message of President Madison, recommending war against England, and he will find the conduct of these traders stated as one of the reasons for declaring war against that Power. Let him look to the papers which accompanied that message, and he will find a volume of testimony supporting that charge. Let him look to the report of the Committee in Congress, to whom these proofs were referred, and he will find it unanimously agreed that these traders, in a period of profound peace, while carrying on a lucrative trade within the American Territories, under the protecting sanction of a treaty, had systematically encouraged the Indians to war against us. The full knowledge of all these facts determined the Administration to make no peace with Great Britain without excluding her traders from all intercourse with Indians living within the United States. In pursuance of this determination, instructions were given to our Commissioners at Ghent not to renew the third article of Mr. Jay's Treaty. A treaty was made, and the article was not renewed. Great was the joy of the West. Vast as had been her losses, her sacrifices of brave citizens in the prosecution of the war, she felt herself compensated by the single advantage of excluding British traders from all intercourse with her Indians. But the care of the Administration did not cease with the conclusion of the treaty. It was necessary to give it effect to carry it into execution, not to suffer a repetition of the faithless conduct which followed the treaty of '83. A plan was immediately projected to occupy, with a military force, all the commanding positions on the frontiers of the Northwest. The Falls of St. Mary, at the outlet of Lake Superior; the Falls of St. Anthony; Prairie du Chien; the Council Bluffs; and the Yellow Stone River, were each to receive a garrison. This plan of defence was projected in the year 1815, Mr. Madison being President, and Mr. Monroe Secretary of War. It was a part of that system of defence which covered the seacoast with fortifications. All the positions were occupied, the Yellow Stone excepted. British traders disappeared from the Upper Mississippi and the Lower Missouri. The Indians, within the points occupied by our troops, returned to habits of friendly intercourse and regular trade with American citizens. But the Upper Missouri was left in the hands of the British. For want of the protection of a military post, American traders, for several years after the conclusion of peace, made no attempt to penetrate that rich fur region which lies at the foot of the Rocky Mountains. In 1821-'2, the first attempts were made. The companies which went out, were engaged in hunting as well as trading. The Crow Indians, a numerous and powerful tribe on the south side of the Yellow Stone, made no objection to the use of the beaver trap among them.—(Mr. Pilcher's statement, page 19, document No. 56.) In the Spring and Summer of 1823, hostilities broke out on the Upper Missouri. General Ashley was attacked by the Arikaras, and lost twenty-six men, killed and wounded. The Missouri Fur Company was attacked by the Blackfeet on the Yellow Stone River, lost seven men killed, and fifteen thousand dollars worth of furs and merchandise. Major Henry was attacked on the same river, by the same tribe of Indians, and lost four or five men killed. The Assinaboins had previously robbed him of some fifty horses upon the Missouri river. This, continued Mr. BENTON, is the narrative of our Indian relations beyond the Mississippi. Of nearly three tribes which are found there, no more than three have been hostile to us! The questions which now present themselves to the Senate, are, first, to ascertain the cause of hostility from these three tribes; secondly, to provide the proper remedy for preserving peace with them in future.

On the first of these inquiries the public mind has been most scandalously abused. Soon after the perpetration of the outrages on the Upper Missouri, a letter, without name, purporting to have been written by an Indian agent in St. Louis, appeared in all the Atlantic papers. It justified the hostilities of the Indians, ascribed their robberies and murders to a just resentment of hunting and "trapping" on their lands, contained the usual portions of abuse upon American traders, and of sentimental love and affection for the oppressed children of the forest. I knew the letter to be a fabrication, but, to satisfy the Senate on that point, an interrogatory was addressed to Major Graham, United States agent beyond the Mississippi, and Mr. Pilcher, partner in the Missouri Fur Company. Their answers will be found in No. 56, of the documents of this session. Major Graham states, that he knows nothing of this letter, and does not believe "such a letter could be written by an Indian agent." Mr. Pilcher states, that he saw it at St. Louis in an Atlantic newspaper—mentioned it to Major O'Fallon, "who was indignant at its contents"—and that he and Major Graham are the only Indian agents upon the Missouri. This testimony fixes the false character of this letter; its diabolical intention was carried upon its face. It was intended to poison the public mind—to overwhelm American traders with public odium—prevent Congress from interfering for their protection, and then continue to the British the exclusive enjoyment of the fur trade beyond the Mandan villages.

The justification set up by the Arikaras is untrue in point of fact. No hunting or "trapping" had taken place upon their grounds. Major Graham, in the document just quoted, says that he never heard of such a thing. Mr. Pilcher states, that no instances had come to his knowledge; that the Arikara country contained very little fur. The circumstances of the attack upon General Ashley prove the falsehood of this pretended justification. He arrived at the Arikara villages on the 30th day of May, on his way to the Rocky Mountains; stopped upon the request of the chiefs; traded on the first day of June for forty or fifty horses; and was preparing to resume his voyage on the morning of the 2d, when he was treacherously attacked, and had twenty-six men killed and wounded. (Document No. 2.) Here was neither hunting upon the Arikara grounds, nor time for any such thing to have taken place. Whence, then, the hostility of these Indians? It is of old date, and almost commensurate with the commencement of our acquaintance with them. It began about the year 1808, in the attack and defeat of an expedition sent by the United States to carry home the Mandan chief, who accompanied Lewis and Clark to the Seat of Government, upon their return from the Pacific Ocean. Lieutenants Prior and Choteau commanded the expedition; the flag of the United States waved at the bow of the boat, yet it was attacked, defeated, compelled to fall back to St. Louis, and no atonement, no satisfaction has ever been obtained for this outrage. The United States submitted to the attack upon her flag, the murder of her soldiers, the disgrace of defeat, and afterwards smuggled home the Mandan chief by the aid of a fur trader. Their late conduct may be stated in the words of Mr. Pilcher.—Document No. 56.

"I know that the Arikaras killed a man about the year 1816 or '17, a little above the Big Bend of the Missouri river, in the Sioux country, who was in the employment of some of the fur traders of St. Louis. I know that a war party of the Arikaras, amounting to 80 or 90 men, came down to that country (Sioux) in the month of April, 1820, and robbed two trading-houses established by the Missouri Fur Company for the trade of the Sioux Indians, one above, the other a little below the Big Bend of Missouri—beat and abused the men in charge of the houses, and then continued down the river to the trading-houses of another company, and robbed them of a considerable amount of merchandise, from the owner's account, not less than sixteen or seventeen hundred dollars. I know that some of the principal braves of that nation attempted, during the last Winter, to rob my clerk while in their own villages, and committed violence upon him. In the month of March last, after this clerk left their villages, and had descended the Missouri to one of our principal Sioux trading-houses, about two hundred miles below the Arikaras, a party of that nation, consisting of about eighty men, came down to the neighborhood of this house, met six of our voyageurs a few miles from it, who were employed in collecting the furs and peltries purchased from the Sioux, stripped them naked in the prairie, robbed them of their clothes, stole three or four horses or mules, beat each of them severely, and left them naked in the prairie. The same party came that night and fired on the house, stole another horse, and went off. A day or two subsequent to these outrages another party, amounting to one hundred and fifteen men, came in daylight, and attacked this house. Mr. McDonald, one of my partners, his clerk, and eight or ten voyageurs, defended themselves and the house, which contained a large amount of property. In this affair the Arikaras lost two men killed, and probably three or four wounded."

Mr. B. called the attention of the Senate to the fact, that all these depredations were committed in the country of the Sioux, two hundred miles from that of the Arikaras, under circumstances which forbid the boldest of their defenders to set up the pretext of repulsing hunters and "trappers" from their violated grounds.

The fabricated letter put up another apology for the Arikaras. It justified their attack upon General Ashley, upon the ground of retaliation for the two men (one of them the son of a chief) killed by the Missouri Fur Company. This justification implies, that the members of this company had no right to repulse an attack upon their house, when one hundred and fifteen Arikaras went two hundred miles into the Sioux country to rob and murder its inhabitants! But the Arikaras themselves set up no such excuse. In their entreaties to General Ashley to stop and trade with them, they expressed regret for the affair with the Missouri Fur Company; and said, that "the angry feelings occasioned by that affray had vanished, and that they considered the Americans as friends." (Document No. 2.) What, then, was their inducement to attack General Ashley? The same which led them two hundred miles to kill and pillage the traders in the Sioux country—love of blood and plunder; and, above all, the contempt of Americans, inspired by the successful and unpunished attack upon the United States troops, in the year 1808. The British traders stand acquitted of this crime. Major Graham and Mr. Pilcher (Document No. 56) say, they have no reason to suspect these traders of instigating the Arikaras. Upon this statement of facts, corroborated by official documents, Mr. B. averred that the Arikaras, from their first attack upon Lieutenants Prior and Choteau, in 1808, to that upon General Ashley in 1823, neither had, nor pretended to have, the plea of preventing hunters from intruding upon their grounds, or revenging previous wrongs upon themselves. Excuses to this effect were fabrications, got up after the fact, to justify the Indians, and to criminate the Americans, and he regretted to say, that these treacherous savages, bathed in the blood of American citizens, were greeted with the public sympathy, while the victims of their barbarity excite no more compassion than if they had been dogs.

Mr. B. next examined the state of our relations with that numerous and powerful tribe of Indians called the Blackfeet. The bands of this tribe ranged over all the country between the Saskatchewan and Yellow Stone rivers, north and south, and between the Mandans and Rocky Mountains, east and west. In this vast district, drained by rivers a thousand miles in length, there was not one resident human being. All were roving, following the buffaloes and other game. To the south of the Yellow Stone live the Crow Indians, also numerous, powerful, and roving. In this district of country, on the headwaters of the Yellow Stone, and Missouri, and along the base of the Rocky Mountains, hunting and "trapping" has taken place by American citizens. The instances are stated by Mr. Pilcher, (Document No. 56), with that explicit candor which commands the respect of every person who reads his statement. The first instance occurred about the year 1808. A company, formed in St. Louis, went to the Three Forks of the Missouri, with the double object of trading with the Indians and "trapping" for beavers. With the Crows, the most friendly intercourse was established; from the Blackfeet, nothing but hostility was encountered. They attacked the company wherever they could be found; killed twenty-seven of their number, and drove the remainder from the country. The next instance did not occur until 1822-3. In the Spring of that year, a party of the Missouri Fur Company penetrated the Three Forks of the Missouri, took much beaver by "trapping," and on their return were attacked by the Blackfeet, defeated, seven of their number killed, and property taken from them to the value of $15,000. About the same time, a party under Major Henry had gone to the same region of country, for the same purpose, and had shared the same fate; they were attacked by the Blackfeet, and had eight or ten men killed and wounded.

The next tribe whose hostility pursues our traders on the Upper Missouri, are the Assinabains. These, also, are wandering. They range principally on the river, the name of which they bear, and make excursions to the banks of the Missouri, in pursuit of buffaloes, and to waylay American traders. No blood is yet laid to their hands; but their hostile disposition has been repeatedly evinced, in the course of the last Summer, by robbing Major Henry's party of some fifty horses, and making an attack upon an American trading house, near the Mandans. Their range upon the Missouri, is between the mouth of the Yellow Stone and the Mandan villages. No hunting or "trapping" has taken place within these limits; none is alleged; and the Assinabains are left without the pretext of that justification.

This is the full history of all the hunting and "trapping" on the Upper Missouri. Some instances occurred in the neighborhood of the Council Bluffs, but was stopped by Major O'Fallon, without having led to any hostile consequence. Justice to the citizens of Missouri requires that the origin of these hunting expeditions should be stated. They began about the year 1808—Meriwether Lewis being Governor of Upper Louisiana, and Superintendent of Indian Affairs. He drew a line between the policy to be observed above and below the Mandan villages. Below that point, he enforced the act of 1802, against hunters upon Indian lands; above that point, he tolerated and recommended hunting and "trapping" expeditions. He did so, as the only means of getting the fur trade from the British. (Lewis & Clarke's Journal, vol. 2, p. 486, Appendix upon Indian Affairs.) Under the sanction of this authority, the practice began, and was revived in 1822-3. The Government is not liable to censure for not stopping it, for their attention was only called to the subject in the course of the last Summer; nor the Missouri citizens liable to be called intruders, for they believed they had lawful permission.

Mr. B. stated, that the Arikaras, Blackfeet, and Assinabains, were the only Indians beyond the Mississippi, which were hostile to the Americans. Out of nearly thirty tribes, between the Mississippi and Rocky Mountains, no more than three have been engaged in hostility against us! The depredations of one of these tribes, the Arikaras, has been traced to their true cause; the depredations of the other two, remain to be accounted for.

It is admitted that hunting and "trapping" has taken place on the ground over which the Blackfeet range; it is admitted that these practices lead to bad consequences—that they ought to be prevented; and the bill now under discussion, in addition to the act of 1802, is intended to prevent them. But it is denied that the Blackfeet are hostile on this account. Their outrages flow from another cause; from a cause wholly unconnected with the conduct of American citizens. Mr. B. felt the delicacy and responsibility of attributing, upon equivocal testimony, a great crime to an absent party; but he felt himself called upon, by his duty to his country, to arraign the British fur traders for all the robberies and murders committed by the Blackfeet and Assinaboin Indians upon the persons and property of American citizens. In doing so, he would submit his reasons and evidences to the Senate, and leave it to all impartial men to judge of the truth.

1st. The British Companies, now united under the charter and name of Hudson Bay, have an inducement to expel American traders from the country beyond the Mandan villages. It is the richest fur region in the world; they have possession of it at present, and every consideration of interest, every feeling of cupidity, impels them to drive competitors away.

2d. They have never failed, when they had an inducement, to employ Indians to kill and rob American traders and citizens. Witness the scenes upon the Northwestern frontier, from the peace of 1783 to the war of 1812; and, in the South, from the same peace to the day of the acquisition of the Floridas.

3d. The affray of Captain Lewis, on his return from the Pacific Ocean, refers itself to British influence. It happened with the Minnetarees of Fort de Prairie, a band of the Blackfeet. It took place on Maria's river, a branch of the Missouri, in that tract of country over which the Blackfeet range. It was the only attempt made upon the lives or property of Messrs. Lewis and Clark, in their adventurous expedition to the Pacific Ocean; and this attempt was made by Indians who had just issued from a British fur trading establishment on the Saskatchewan river! The inference is irresistible.

4th. Previous to the late war, the Sioux Indians, trading with the British on the Upper Mississippi, annually came across the Missouri river, in the region of the Council Bluffs, waylaid American traders, robbed them, and compelled their voyageurs to carry the furs and peltries, thus acquired, to Prairie du Chien, where they were sold to British traders! In plain English, the Sioux then performed for the British, on the Lower Missouri, the service which the Blackfeet are now rendering them on the upper waters of that river. Mr. B. stated this fact upon the authority of the late Governor Lewis, and read a passage from Lewis and Clarke's Journal, (vol. 2, page 442,) which confirmed it. He laid particular stress upon it, because the Sioux continued these depredations as long as British traders continued on the Upper Mississippi, and quit them as soon as these traders, in virtue of the Ghent Treaty, were expelled from that of the territories of the United States.

5. The declarations of the Blackfeet to Manuel Lisa. This enterprising trader penetrated to the base of the Rocky Mountains, about the year 1808. He had twenty-seven men killed, and was driven from the country. A year or two afterwards, he succeeded in gaining a friendly interview with some Blackfeet—explained his object in having come to trade with them, and expostulated with them for the massacre of his men. They told him, "it was not their fault; that the British gave them so many guns, knives, and blankets, for Americans' hair, that they could not help taking it." Mr. B. had often heard this statement from Manuel Lisa, in St. Louis, and relied upon its truth.

6th. The attack upon Immell and Jones. The massacre of these gentlemen, and five of their companions, and the loss of $15,000 of their property, has been already stated. The circumstances attending it will show to whom we are indebted for this foul deed. Returning from the Rocky Mountains, they met, on Jefferson river, a party of thirty-eight Blackfeet. Suspicious of their treacherous hostility, the Americans stood upon their defence. An Indian then advanced with a paper in his hand. On the back was written "God save the King." The inside was a letter of recommendation to the bearer. It was headed "Mountain Post, 1823." The letter was without signature—was written on the leaf of an account book, and in the English language. A very friendly interview followed, and the parties separated with professions of friendship, and an engagement that the Blackfeet should trade with the Americans at the mouth of Maria's river. Messrs. Immell and Jones hastened their journey, with apprehensions of treachery. They had reached the Yellow Stone in safety, and were following a trace down its bank, where high hills closing down upon the river, created a long and narrow defile, when they were fired upon by an ambuscade of three or four hundred Indians. They were Blackfeet, headed by the chief who had met them, some days before, with the letter endorsed "God save the King."

6. The Blackfeet, Assinaboins, and Arikaras, are the only Indians west of the Mississippi, hostile to the Americans. The two first trade exclusively with the British; the third has done so until within a few years past. Messrs. Graham and Pilcher both say that all the tribes which have no trade with the British are friendly to us; all those who trade with them are our enemies.—(Document No. 56.) The Blackfeet and Assinaboins not only trade with the British, but they are British Indians. They come from the north side of latitude 49. The latter come from the river whose name they bear, a water of Lake Winipeg; the former from the Saskatchewan river. They are placed, in Sir Alexander McKenzie's map, upon the upper waters of that river, under parallels fifty-three and fifty-four of north latitude. This was their position in the year 1793, when McKenzie visited them, and when there was no inducement to give them a wrong location. By what means, then, are these Blackfeet found south of latitude 39, ranging as lords and masters over a vast district of country, and killing American citizens upon the waters of the Missouri, upon the rivers which we call Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin? It is by virtue of British arms, and lawless violence, that they do these things. The true owners of all that country are the Sho-shonees, and the different bands of the Snake Indians, now hid in the caves and recesses of the Rocky Mountains. They have been driven from the land of their fathers by the superior arms of the British Indians. For want of arms they have been unable to reconquer their country. The British traders will not supply them, because it is their interest to maintain the supremacy of the Blackfeet; the Spaniards of Santa Fe refuse, on the pretext that fire arms would be dangerous to themselves, but in reality because it is their policy to keep the neighboring Indians as weak and dependent as possible. In support of these statements, Mr. BENTON read passages from pages 419, 20, 1, 2, 3, of vol. 2, of Lewis and Clark's Journal.

From these it appeared that the Sho-shonees and other bands of the Snakes, were the owners of the country from the base of the Rocky Mountains, and covering all the upper waters of the Yellow Stone and Missouri; that the Saskatchewan Indians, armed with guns, had invaded their country, and driven them into the mountains; that they led the most miserable life, subsisting upon roots and berries, and only venturing, by stealth, into their own country, in search of a buffalo; that the Blackfeet killed them wherever they could find them, &c.

7. The conduct of British traders to each other. The Hudson Bay and Northwest Company, now united, were lately rivals in trade. Out of that rivalry arose a war, which continued for several years. Each endeavored to drive the other from the field of trade. Murder and robbery were the means; themselves, sometimes disguised as Indians, aided by Indians, were the instruments of execution. As an exemplification of the character of this war for the fur trade, Mr. B. read the account of the massacre of Governor Semple, of the Hudson Bay Company, in the year 1815, by the agents and "half-breeds" of the Northwest Company. He took the account as he found it in the London Quarterly Review, a work which admits no falsehood to the prejudice of the British character. The scene of the massacre was in front of Fort Douglas, at the confluence of the Assinaboin and Red rivers, where the Earl of Selkirk, proprietor of the Hudson Bay charter, had planted a Scotch colony, and erected a military work mounting twenty pieces of cannon, for the double object of protecting his traders and colonists. The object of Mr. BENTON in referring to this war, and showing its remorseless character, was to have the benefit of the inference that, as these companies, when rivals, endeavored, by murder and robbery, to drive each other from the fur trade, so when united, they would naturally pursue the same means to drive American citizens from the same commerce.

"The account, (says the Review,) given in the Montreal Herald of the 12th of October, evidently from one of the few persons who survived the massacre, is probably the true one. From this it appears, that a regular expedition was fitted out by the Northwest Company, to drive away, for the second time, the people belonging to the Hudson Bay Company, who had repossessed themselves of their establishment on Red river. Governor Semple, observing their approach, said 'We must go and meet those people—let twenty men follow me.' They had only proceeded a few hundred yards when several colonists came running towards them in great dismay, crying out 'The Northwest Company—the half-breeds!' Having advanced half a mile from Fort Douglas, a numerous body of cavalry appeared from behind a wood, surrounded the Governor and his people, when one Bouche, a Canadian, rode up to Mr. Semple, demanding their fort. The Governor answered, 'Go to your fort.' 'You,' retorted Bouche, 'have destroyed our fort, you damned rascal.' 'Scoundrel,' said the Governor, laying his hand upon Bouche's bridle, 'dare you call me so?' Bouche sprang from his horse, and a shot was immediately fired, by which Lieutenant Holt fell. The next shot wounded the Governor, who called out to his men, 'Do what you can to take care of yourselves;' but he was so much beloved that they affectionately gathered round him to learn what injury he had suffered; when a volley of musketry was poured into the group, which killed several and wounded the greater part of them.

"The cavalry galloped towards the survivors, who took off their hats, and called for mercy. But this address for mercy was made to the servants of the Northwest Company, and at their hands was immediately received by what must be presumed the accustomed measure of their compassion—a speedy termination of earthly calamities. The knife, the axe, or the ball, in able and willing hands, soon placed in lasting repose, those whom pain or terror had rendered clamorous. Thus fell Governor Semple, a man of amiable and modest manners, and of a most humane and benevolent disposition; his private secretary, the surgeon, two officers, and fifteen settlers. Their bodies are stated to have been barbarously mangled to gratify the savage rancor of their murderers, commanded by a Mr. Cuthbert Grant, who told the survivor that, if the remainder in the fort showed the least resistance, 'neither man, woman, nor child, should be spared.'—Vol. 16, 131, 2.

Upon this exposition of facts and reasons, Mr. B. submitted, that he stood fully justified in charging all the robberies and murders committed by the Blackfeet and Assinaboin Indians, to the diabolical machinations of British traders. The true cause of their hostility being shown, the question is, upon the means of putting an end to these outrages, and preserving the fur trade, within the United States, to American citizens.

The bill reported by the committee, contemplates four provisions to accomplish these objects:

1. To enter into treaties of trade and friendship with the principal tribes beyond the Mississippi.
2. To locate the traders.
3. To appoint additional sub-agents to be employed upon the Upper Missouri.

4. To establish a military post at, or beyond, the Mandans.

Mr. B. showed the necessity and propriety of each of these provisions.

"1. To regulate commerce with the Indians," was a power granted to Congress by the Constitution. So far as our own citizens were concerned, they could be regulated by law; but, so far as the Indians were concerned, it must be done by treaty. We have treaties with all the tribes on this side the Mississippi, and with some on the other; but none with the remote tribes, whose trade would be so valuable, and whose friendship is so desirable to us. The bill proposes an appropriation of $10,000, to defray the expenses of holding those treaties. With those who admit the importance of the object to be accomplished, the amount of this appropriation can furnish no objection.

2. To locate the traders. This is a provision repeatedly recommended, by both United States agents and traders. It will put an end to many dissensions among the traders, and secure to the Indian the fullest and fairest market for the barter of his furs and peltries. By confining the traders to particular spots, designated by the agents, all trespasses upon Indian grounds will be effectually prevented.

3. The appointment of two sub-agents, subordinate to the principal agent, on the Upper Missouri. This measure is recommended on the score of economy, and from a conviction that the views of the Government would be better promoted, in that remote quarter, by active sub-agents, subordinate to a principal, than by several agents, independent of each other.

4. To advance a military post to the Upper Missouri. The number of troops intended for this service, is four companies. The committee have been careful to ascertain the expense of the movement. Document No. 56 will show their correspondence with the War Department, in which this number is deemed sufficient, and the expense is estimated at $13,100. For this sum, it is computed, by the Quartermaster General, that the troops may be transported, with full supplies for one year.

Mr. BENTON held this to be the main provision of the bill. Without it, he believed, all the others would be vain and nugatory. He knew that both Houses of Congress, some years since, had decided against such an establishment, but the facts were not known then, which are now communicated—facts which show that we must surrender the fur trade within our own limits to the Hudson Bay Company, or protect our traders by the advance of a military post. The most powerful considerations of interest, policy, and justice, require us to adopt the latter alternative. I do not use these words at random, said Mr. B., nor for the purpose of filling up and rounding off a sentence. I have regard to the facts, and to the import of language, when I say that interest, policy, and justice, require the American fur traders to be protected by their Government. The amount of the trade, its peculiar value, and the encouragement it gives to domestic industry, make it our interest to protect it. The official returns for the last year, show that $675,000 of capital were invested in this trade; extend it to the Rocky Mountains, and it will be augmented to at least a million per annum, for an indefinite number of years to come. The British companies have taken furs to the value of $300,000 sterling, (about a million and a quarter of dollars,) for forty years past. The peculiar value of this trade should make it an object of national attention. Our hat manufactories furnish fourteen millions of dollars worth of hats per annum. Fur is the chief material used in this great manufactory, and the districts of country from which it has been heretofore obtained, are rapidly exhausting. None of the fine furs can now be taken east of the Mississippi. Beyond that river, as far out as the meridian of the Mandan villages, the country is one continued plain, a succession of open prairies, destitute of shelter for furred animals, even in the period of gestation. It is from this district, and from the British traders, that the hat manufactories of the United States are now supplied. But how long will this supply continue? Certainly, it must cease in a few years, and, unless our traders are protected in penetrating the rich and exhaustless fur region of the Rocky Mountains, our own manufactories must quit work, and a vast sum must go to England annually, to purchase hats made of the fur which is taken from the territories of the United States.

Besides the magnitude of the trade, and its peculiar value, it has other claims upon the attention of the nation, from the encouragement it will give to home industry. In England the fur companies are cherished by the Parliament, because they employ in their trade annually fifty thousand pounds sterling, ($240,000,) of British manufactured goods. Every article which enters into this trade, and the raw material of which it is made, is the product of our own country. Coarse cottons, woollens, hardware, powder, lead, tobacco, are the chief articles of this trade. Mr. Pilcher, himself a fur trader, states, that all these articles can be as well manufactured in the United States as in England. The British patterns, which have been adapted to the taste and wants of the Indians, are alone to be followed. No superior or peculiar workmanship is required. Mr. B. appealed to the Senate, to say, if, in this point of view, as the annual consumer of a vast amount of home manufactures, made of home materials, the fur trade was not entitled to the protection of the Government?

Our policy unites itself with our interest. Policy requires us to preserve the trade of the Indians, as the only means of preserving their friendship. Their traders rule them. They did so under the Colonial Government, when French traders led the attack upon the forts and settlements of the colonists. They have done so ever since; the British trader succeeding to the French, and leading the same Indians to the slaughter of Americans. At this moment, every tribe beyond the Mississippi, which trades with Americans, is friendly; every tribe which trades with the British, is at war with us! Justice requires this protection to the West. Atlantic commerce is protected by ships of war in every sea, by Ambassadors at every Court, by a chain of lighthouses, illuminated at the annual expense of $145,000, to light the returning cargo into port. Shall the West, then, solicit in vain for a little post, a handful of men, and a few miserable dollars, to protect the lives of her citizens, upon the soil of their country, engaged in the prosecution of a trade of indispensable value to the whole Union? If any one resists this appeal, said Mr. B., I ask him if it is not right to be just before we are generous? To take care of our own household, before we go forth in quest of foreign adventures? We have a colony of deported negroes, upon the coast of Africa. We vote fifty thousand dollars annually, and send out a ship of war for their protection. Last year they were attacked by their fellow-countrymen, and seven of their number killed and wounded. The agent of the establishment called on Capt. Spence, of the United States ship Cyane, to land his crew, and build them "a permanent and powerful fortification." It was done. A martella tower of strong mason work was immediately constructed, and the public journals resounded with applause. At this very session, within a few days past, we have repeated our vote of fifty thousand dollars, for this charitable enterprise on the coast of Africa. Yet the West asks for thirty thousand dollars only for the protection of her trade and citizens; and shall it be denied?

When Mr. B. had concluded—

Mr. LOWRIE expressed some doubts as to the propriety of the fifth section of this bill. He considered the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, on this subject, as very valuable—several new points had been stated by that gentleman. He had entertained an unfavorable impression of the conduct of the Americans, in relation to the Indian tribes which had been spoken of, from the documents communicated by the President. He wished a few days delay, in order again to examine the documents to which he had alluded.

Mr. BENTON said that delay in the consideration of the bill would be destruction to it. It was of the greatest importance that it should be acted upon immediately. He thought there could be no occasion for delay. He answered some objections made by Mr. LOWRIE to the fifth section. The bill constituted a complete system, and he would be unwilling to relinquish any section of it.

Mr. CHANDLER remarked that he was not as well informed on this subject as the gentleman from Missouri had shown himself to be; and he, therefore, wished for further time to examine it. He moved the postponement of the bill until Wednesday next.

Messrs. HOLMES of Maine, and JOHNSON of Kentucky, made a few remarks on the subject. The bill was then postponed to, and made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

And, on motion, the Senate adjourned until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 30.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a joint resolution providing for the purchase of a certain number of the Journals of the Old Congress.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the bill extending the benefit of copy-rights to the authors of paintings or drawings, and the bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court of the United States for the district of Illinois," reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. BARTON communicated a letter from James Miller, and others, in answer to a letter from the Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, showing the necessity of establishing a surveyor general's office in the Territory of Arkansas; and the letter and answer were ordered to be printed.

Mr. NOBLE presented the petition of James Lloyd, late a marine in the service of the United States, praying a pension; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill, supplementary to an act of Congress, passed on the 13th day of June, 1812, entitled "An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri;" the bill for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia; and the resolutions providing a place of deposit for the portrait of Columbus, and directing the distribution of certain copies of the Declaration of Independence, now in the Department of State; were severally read the second time. The bill to provide for the sale of the warehouse at the former quarantine ground, near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling-house at the Balize, in said State, for the use of the boarding officer at that place, and for other purposes; was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to repeal the act approved the 3d March, 1823, entitled 'An act for the relief of John B. Hogan,'" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Barbara Paulus."

They concur in the 1st, 2d, 3d, 6th, 7th, and 8th, of the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1824;" they disagree to the 4th of said amendments, and concur in the fifth, with an amendment; in which bills and amendment they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last brought up for concurrence were severally read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, as amended; and, on motion, it was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to change the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the circuit court in Kentucky; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Chitwood;" and it was postponed until tomorrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land district; together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands; and Mr. LOWRIE proposed a further amendment to the bill; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VAN DYKE presented the memorial of Thomas Robinson, in behalf of himself and others, children of the late General Thomas Robinson, of Delaware, who was one of the sureties of Sharp Dulany, formerly collector of the port of Philadelphia, praying that the estate of his father may be released from the payment of the interest that has accrued on a debt due from said Dulany to the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The amendments made by the Senate to the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1824," and which were disagreed to by the House of Representatives, were then taken up. The first amendment was, an appropriation "for graduating and improving the grounds around the President's House, $2,000." The Senate then agreed to recede from this amendment.

The next amendment proposed by the Senate, and not concurred in by the House of Representatives, was, to make provision for "an agent," to be attached to the board of commissioners, under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, for making compensation for slaves taken away during the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. SMITH moved that the Senate do recede from this amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR said, that, on the subject of this agency, the sentiments which he had expressed, when it was before under consideration, still remained unchanged, and, indeed, some further occurrences had confirmed his belief, that this officer was very necessary for the business of the commission. But, still, he did not believe it of sufficient importance to the country at large, to produce a collision between the two Houses of Congress. In consequence of this conviction, he was prepared to recede from the amendment.

The question on receding was put and carried.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The bill "providing for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. This bill was introduced, on leave granted, by Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, and reported with sundry amendments, by the Committee on the Judiciary. These amendments were in the details of the bill. Some remarks were made upon them, by Messrs. CHANDLER, TAYLOR, of Virginia, LOWRIE, and BARBOUR. They were then agreed to. The bill provides a tribunal for the adjustment of that class of private claims, upon which so much of the time of Congress has been consumed. Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, proposed to amend the bill by limiting its operation to claims of a certain amount, Messrs. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, and TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke upon this amendment, and it was then agreed to. Mr. MILLS submitted an amendment, limiting the provisions of the bill to citizens of the United States. This was also agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, as amended. The amendments were agreed to, in Senate, and, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, the bill was laid on the table.

WEDNESDAY, March 31.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bills which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act extending the term of pensions granted to persons disabled, and to the widows and orphans of those who have been slain, or who have died in consequence of wounds or casualties received while in the line of their duty, on board the private armed ships of the United States, during the late war," and "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia,' with amendments to each; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the first mentioned bill, and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the last mentioned bill; and, on motion, they were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of Nathaniel Potter, and others, recommending to the attention of Congress a new planetarium, invented by Theodore Newell, and soliciting for the inventor and invention such encouragement as they may merit; which was read, and referred to the Joint Library Committee.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Shields, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Shields; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of War, with a statement of the expenditures at the national armories, and of the arms, &c., made therein; which was read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution to authorize the purchase of a certain number of the copies of the Journals of Congress from 1774 to 1788; which was twice read, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Swann and others, reported a bill altering the times of holding the courts in the District of Columbia; which was twice read, by unanimous consent; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration thereof as in Committee of the Whole, and, no amendment having been proposed, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill to change the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the circuit court in Kentucky, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill entitled "An act to repeal an act approved the 3d of March, 1823, entitled 'An act for the relief of John B. Hogan,'" was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Barbara Paulas," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill confirming certain acts of James Miller, as Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes; and, no amendment having been proposed, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

INDIAN FUR TRADE.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill "to enable the President to carry into effect the treaty made at Ghent, the 24th of December, 1814, excluding foreigners from trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States, and to preserve the fur trade within the limits of the said United States to American citizens," was again taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DICKERSON addressed the Chair. He said he did not rise to offer any amendments to the bill; but to call the attention of the Senate to the extent of one of its provisions; which he had not perceived till he heard the argument of the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) yesterday. When he heard the title of the bill, to carry into effect the Treaty of Ghent, he had not conceived that one, if not the chief object of it was, to authorize the transportation of a part of our army to some point on the Missouri—as high as the falls of that river. He was at a loss to know what article of the Treaty of Ghent was to be carried into effect by this provision of the bill—it could only apply to the ninth article, which required that we should put an end to hostilities with all the Indian tribes, or nations, with whom we were at war, and forthwith restore to such tribes or nations, respectively, all the possessions, rights, and privileges, which they may have enjoyed, or been entitled to, in the year 1811, previous to such hostilities. Similar conditions were required of the British Government. As it is our own part of the treaty only which we are to carry into effect, this bill cannot be intended to carry into effect the treaty on the part of the British; that must be left for them to provide for. How this bill is to produce the effect indicated by its title, has not yet been explained.

It is intended by this bill to authorize the President of the United States to send an armed force, of four companies at least, to some point upon the Upper Missouri, as high as the falls of that river; which is about 800 miles above the Yellow Stone, which is 900 miles above Council Bluffs, which is 650 miles above the mouth of Missouri—in all, 2,350 miles above the mouth of the Missouri—and this for the avowed purpose of protecting traders, but which would operate as a protection to the hunters and trappers upon the Indian territories.

It will not be pretended, that moving troops up the Missouri can be necessary for the protection of our frontiers. Council Bluffs, where we have a military establishment, is three hundred miles in advance of the western boundary of the State of Missouri.

The object cannot be to make preparations for extending our population to the Upper Missouri, for, thank Heaven, that country does not admit of a white population. In the account of Major Long's expedition from Pittsburg to the Rocky Mountains, we have a particular account of the vast country lying between the meridian of the Council Bluffs and the Rocky Mountains. Vol. 2, page 350:

"Proceeding westward from the meridian above specified, the hilly country gradually subsides, giving place to a region of vast extent, spreading towards the North and South, and presenting an undulating surface, with nothing to limit or variegate the view, but here and there a hill, knob, or insulated tract of table land. At length, the Rocky Mountains break upon the view, towering abruptly from the plains, and mingling their snow-capped summits with the clouds." "On approaching the mountains, no other change is observable in the general aspect of the country, except that the isolated knobs and table lands, above alluded to, become more frequent, and more distinctly marked. The bluffs, by which the valleys of water courses are bounded, present a greater abundance of rocks; stones lie in greater profusion upon the surface, and the soil becomes more sterile. If to the characteristics above intimated, we add that of an almost complete destitution of woodland, (for not more than one thousandth part of the section can be said to possess a timber growth,) we shall have a pretty correct idea of the general aspect of the country."

Page 452.—"Throughout this section of country, the surface is occasionally characterized by water-worn pebbles, and gravel of granite, gneiss, and quartz; but the predominant characteristic is sand, which, in many instances, prevails almost to the entire exclusion of vegetable mould. Large tracts are often to be met with, exhibiting scarcely a trace of vegetation. The whole region, as before hinted, is almost entirely destitute of a timber growth of any description. In some few instances, however, sandy knobs and ridges make their appearance, thickly covered with red cedars, of a dwarfish growth. There are also some few tracts, clad in a growth of pitch pine and scrubby oaks; but, in general, nothing of vegetation appears upon the uplands, but withered grass of stunted growth, no more than two or three inches high, prickly pears profusely covering extensive tracts, and weeds of a few varieties, which, like the prickly pears, seem to thrive best in the most arid and sterile soils."

Page 361.—"In regard to this extensive section of country, we do not hesitate in giving the opinion, that it is almost wholly unfit for cultivation; and, of course, uninhabitable by a people depending upon agriculture for subsistence. Although tracts of fertile land, considerably extensive, are occasionally to be met with, yet the scarcity of wood and water, almost uniformly prevalent, will prove an insuperable obstacle in the way of settling the country. This objection rests not only against the immediate section under consideration, but applies with equal propriety to a much larger portion of the country. Agreeably to the best intelligence that can be had, concerning the country both northward and southward of the section, and especially to the inferences deducible from the account given by Lewis and Clark, of the country situated between the Missouri and the Rocky Mountains, above the River Platte, the vast region commencing near the sources of the Sabine, Trinity, Brazos, and Colorado, and extending northwardly to the 49th degree of North latitude, by which the United States territory is limited in that direction, is, throughout, of a similar character. The whole of this region seems peculiarly adapted as a range for buffaloes, wild goats, and other wild game, incalculable multitudes of which find ample pasturage and subsistence upon it."

"This region, however, viewed as a frontier, may prove of infinite importance to the United States, inasmuch as it is calculated to serve as a barrier to prevent too great an extension of our population westward, and secure us against the machinations or incursions of an enemy, that might be disposed to annoy us in that quarter."

There is no part of the valuable work before me, said Mr. D., which has given me so much pleasure as that which I have just read. It is a melancholy truth, that the aborigines of this continent must and will be exterminated from every section of the country in which agriculture can be followed with success. Such has been, such must be their fate! But here seemed to be a region, in which a remnant of the innumerable tribes that once traversed our forests, might find a habitation, safe from the overwhelming flood of white population, which would otherwise drive them from the face of the earth. But even this last refuge is to fail them, if our hunters and trappers are to be supported by an armed force, while they utterly destroy the beaver and buffalo of this vast region.

It is intended to send four companies to the Upper Missouri. Mr. D. said, he was informed by a gentleman of great military experience, and well acquainted with that country, that four companies would be altogether inadequate to the purpose intended; that they would be easily cut off by the Indians; that it would not be safe to send a smaller force than two or three regiments—and if these should be stationed as high up as the Falls of Missouri, it would require several regiments more to be stationed at different points on the river; otherwise, all supplies would be cut off, and our forces would perish for want of subsistence. Our troops on the Upper Missouri must depend almost entirely upon supplies from our settlements at and below Council Bluffs. Neither grain nor cattle can be procured in those sterile regions. Even turnips cannot be raised among the rocks and sand of the region in latitude forty-eight. General Gaines states, that, within our Western boundaries, there are thirty thousand warriors. They are, probably, overrated; but, no doubt, they are sufficiently strong to destroy any force which it has been proposed to send among them.

The sum of thirteen thousand one hundred dollars, proposed to be appropriated for transporting this military force to the Upper Missouri, will defray but a very small portion of the expense. We must judge of the future by the past. The expense of the Yellow Stone expedition will afford us some data for forming an estimate of the expense of an expedition to the Falls of the Missouri. The expedition for Yellow Stone advanced no farther than Council Bluffs: yet the expense of transporting a small military force to that point has been enormous. The transportation of one hundred and forty-five tons of provisions, munitions of war, &c., by the steamboat expedition, one hundred and forty-five tons by the Jefferson, seventy-five tons by the Johnson, with three hundred troops, chiefly from the north of the Missouri, to Council Bluffs, cost the United States $255,000. There are other charges, to a very large amount, to be brought into the account; so that it may be estimated that the transportation of our troops to Council Bluffs, with all the necessary supplies, munitions of war, &c., cost us at about the rate of one thousand dollars per man. What, then, will be the expense of sending an armed force sixteen or seventeen hundred miles further up the river, with all the necessary supplies? Certainly much greater than could be balanced by any trade that could be established with the Indians. The difficulties and expenses of the expedition would increase in something like a geometrical ratio, as it should recede from our settlements; from which alone supplies could be obtained. The expense of maintaining a military post, in a situation so remote, would be enormous.

But the most exceptionable part of the bill is, not the protection of the fair traders, which is intended, but the protection of the hunters and trappers, which will be effected. These military posts multiply the points of collision with the Indian tribes, and must lead to wars with them. The hunters and trappers will be, and ought to be, resisted by them. Their rights to their buffalo, their beaver, and their game, are as sacred as our rights to our property. It would be as just in them to invade our territories and take off our cattle, as it would be, on our part, to take and destroy their beaver, and much less cruel. For, if our cattle are taken away, we soon raise more—not so with the beaver—once destroyed, or driven from a region, they appear there no more. Taking away their buffalo, their beaver, and their game, is striking at their very existence; they look with terror upon these hunters and trappers, as the instruments of their extermination. Can they be blamed for resisting them? And yet, when they do, it becomes necessary to chastise and subdue them; although it may be against the laws of humanity, the circumstances of the country require it. But every principle of justice and humanity requires that we should avoid and prevent the causes of provocation. Have there been no circumstances of aggression, which have provoked the late hostilities of the Indians? The facts before us will not warrant an answer in the negative.

General Ashley and Major Henry had a license to trade with the Indians. The laws prohibit their trapping and hunting in the Indian territories. To take with them a company of hunters and trappers among the Indians, against their will, was itself an act of aggression and hostility. General Ashley traded with the Arikaras for fifty or sixty horses, without a special license for that purpose. These were not necessary for the usual purposes of trade. His party consisted of ninety men—a much larger number than was necessary for the purposes of Indian trade; but not more than was necessary for the purpose of hunting and trapping. The Arikaras could not doubt but this expedition was fitted out for the purpose of hunting and trapping. Two of the Arikaras had been killed in an affray with the Missouri Fur Company; one of them, a son of a principal Chief of the tribe, which, notwithstanding their professions to the contrary, they had not forgotten. They treacherously attacked General Ashley's party, and killed, fourteen, and wounded nine of his men, for which they have been severely and justly chastised.

But, were the Indians not justified in their suspicions that this was an expedition for the purpose of hunting and trapping? Major O'Fallon, one of our Indian agents, had no doubt that a license had been granted to General Ashley and Major Henry, to trade, trap, and hunt, on the Upper Missouri. General Atkinson, in his letter of the 15th August, 1823, says, "A Mr. Smith, who came down with the proceeds of the trappers and hunters of General Ashley, from the mouth of Yellow Stone, gives also some verbal news, to the following effect, viz: 'He left the Yellow Stone with Mr. Henry, with all the party under him, except twenty men, left in the fort at the mouth of the Yellow Stone.'"

Can any one doubt that the expedition under General Ashley and Major Henry was for the purpose of hunting and trapping, as well as for carrying on trade with the Indians?

What were the circumstances attending the Missouri Fur Company, under Immel and Jones, who were attacked and killed by the Blackfeet Indians? Were they innocent traders, or were they hunters and trappers, invading the Indian territories? T. F. Gordon, a young gentleman in the service of that company, in his letter of the 15th June last, says "It becomes my unpleasant duty to inform you of the defeat of our party by the Blackfeet Indians, and of the dire consequences of the same. After penetrating to the three forks of the Missouri, early in the Spring, although we found that country almost trapped out by the Indians, we had succeeded, by the greatest perseverance, in taking about — — packs of beaver. On the 16th of May, having reached the upper Three Forks of R. Jefferson's river, and finding no beaver in that quarter, we commenced a retrograde march to the Yellow Stone," &c. These were certainly the most indefatigable, enterprising, persevering company of hunters and trappers that ever afflicted the Indian tribes. It would have been very satisfactory to know the number of packs of beaver taken by these trappers, but there is an unfortunate blank in the letter; the reason for withholding this information is not known. The Blackfeet Indians waylaid this company, and, says Mr. Gordon, "they rushed upon us with their whole force, pouring down from every quarter. Messrs. Immel and Jones both fell early in the engagement. A conflict thus unequal, could not long be maintained. The result was the loss of five other men killed, four wounded; the entire loss of all our horses and equipage; traps, beaver, and every thing." And shall it be said that the Missouri Fur Company are innocent, unoffending traders? On the contrary, have they not unnecessarily provoked these Indian hostilities?

It is said, these Indians sell their furs to the British traders. If so, it must be because those traders treat them more kindly than ours, give them a better price for their furs and peltries, and sell them goods at a cheaper rate. The Indians understand their interests as well as their rights, and when they can carry on their commerce with our traders with as much advantage as with the British, ours will be preferred. The British traders do not hunt or trap upon the Indian territories, within their boundaries. They gain the confidence of the Indians by acts of kindness, which ours ought to do, but which they never will do, while they rely upon an armed force to enable them to impose their own conditions upon the Indians.

We are told that the British traders come within our boundaries to trade with the Indians. If so, the means are sufficient, under our present laws, for their expulsion. We are also told that there is an armed force at Fort Douglass, on Moose river, within our boundaries. If there is such a force established there, under the Government of Great Britain, it ought to be made a matter of complaint against that Government. A remedy ought to be sought by negotiation.

If we can have a peaceful trade with the Indian tribes on the Upper Missouri, it ought to be maintained, even at great expense. If we cannot, in the name of humanity let it be abandoned. But the views of these fur companies are of a character decidedly hostile towards these Indians. Even the late expedition against the Ricaras seems to have been a war of the hunters and trappers against that tribe, in which the United States acted as allies. It was through the agency of the Missouri Fur Company that the Sioux were induced to take part against the Ricaras. Colonel Leavenworth marched against this tribe with 220 regular troops, 80 men of General Ashley's company, 40 of the Missouri Fur Company, and about four or five hundred Sioux Indians. The Ricaras, after their towns were battered about their ears, and many of their people killed, begged for peace. This, Colonel Leavenworth, as well as General Ashley, was willing to grant. Not so the Missouri Fur Company. They were determined to carry on the war, and the United States were under the necessity of making a separate peace. Upon this subject I will quote from Colonel Leavenworth's official letter:

"The Ricaras sent out and begged for peace. They said that the first shot from our cannon had killed the celebrated chief called Grey Eyes, who caused all the mischief; and that we had killed a great many of their people, and their horses. They were evidently very much terrified, and completely humbled. Being convinced of this, and supposing that the Government would be better pleased to have these Indians corrected than exterminated, and as the Sioux, amounting to about seven or eight hundred warriors, had left us, in a very strange and unaccountable manner, it was thought best, under all the circumstances of the case, to listen to the solicitations of the Ricaras for peace, especially as it was understood that our round shot were nearly all expended. Consequently a treaty was made with them, a copy of which is enclosed. In making this treaty I met with every possible difficulty which it was in the power of the Missouri Fur Company to throw in my way; and as Mr. Pilcher, their acting partner, had been appointed as special sub-agent to raise the Sioux against the Ricaras, he was able to give me great trouble."

Colonel Leavenworth, after stating the damage that had been done to the Indians, the number that had been killed, that they fled from their towns, and other circumstances, adds:

"On the morning of the 15th we placed the mother of the late chief, Grey Eyes, (an aged and infirm woman, whom they had left in their flight,) in one of the principal lodges of the lower village; gave her plenty of provisions and water, and left her in the quiet possession of the towns, and the property left by the Indians, except some corn, which had been taken for the subsistence of the men. At about 10 o'clock of the 15th the troops were embarked, to descend the river, and our guard withdrawn, and every soul removed from the villages, except the woman before-mentioned. All the boats were got underweigh about the same time."

"Before we were out of sight of the towns, we had the mortification to discover that they were on fire. There is no doubt but they have been consumed to ashes; nor is there any doubt but that they were set on fire by one McDonald, a partner, and one Gordon, a clerk of the Missouri Fur Company."

"If the nation has been deprived of the advantages which might have resulted from the magnanimity of her troops, towards a fallen and humbled enemy, it is chargeable to that company, or to those individuals who set the towns on fire. Had not this been done, there is no room to doubt but that the Ricara Indians would, in future, have behaved as well towards our countrymen, as any other Indians on the river. It is now my deliberate opinion that those Indians will be excited to further hostilities, if in the power of the Missouri Fur Company to effect it."

Such are the means by which the Indians are provoked to hostilities by the hunters and trappers who traverse their country. If this system is to be pursued, I am utterly averse to placing any military force higher up the Missouri than Council Bluffs. This is three hundred miles in advance of the Western boundary of the State of Missouri—far enough for the protection of our frontier settlements—far enough for all the purposes of fair trade.

Mr. BENTON replied. He imputed the remarks made by the Senator from New Jersey to his want of information upon the subject. He stated that the title of the bill had reference to the effect of the whole Treaty of Ghent, because that treaty did not revive the 3d article of Mr. Jay's treaty. In this respect alone, the Ghent treaty was worth, to the Western States, all the blood and treasure which the late war had cost them. But how was it to be executed against British traders? The President, as executor of the laws, was bound to carry the treaty into effect. How? By going to the Northwestern frontier in person to keep out Englishmen? No, sir; but by sending troops: and this is what the bill proposes, and what has been intended by two successive Administrations.

The Senator from New Jersey has read from Major Long's Journal, to show that the country beyond the Mandan villages was barren, sterile, and unfit for cultivation. Without opposing other authority to this description of the country, Mr. B. would ask for the application of the fact, taking it to be as stated by Major Long; was it an argument against the bill? Not at all. To the contrary, it was in favor of it: for it was not the intention of the bill to send out an agricultural colony, but a military post, to protect the fur trade; and, the more uninhabitable, inaccessible, and mountainous the country, the better it was for the furred animals, and the better theatre it presented for the trader.

The Senator objects to sending a post to the Falls of Missouri. Well: the bill does not name the Falls, or any other point. It leaves it to the President to station the troops at such point on the Upper Missouri, as will accomplish the objects intended. It would be wrong to name a precise point in the bill. Congress have their duties assigned them by the Constitution; and the President has his, prescribed by the same high authority. It is the business of Congress to vote the troops and the supplies; it is the right of the President to employ them where the public service may require their presence. The mouth of the Yellow Stone river will probably be the point. That name has become unpopular; but, in exciting public odium against it, it may be well to look to the origin of its selection. It was selected by Lewis and Clark, on their return from the Pacific Ocean, as the proper point for commanding the rich fur trade of the Rocky Mountains. It was approved by the Administration in the year 1815, Mr. Madison being President, and Mr. Monroe Secretary of War. Recollection of these facts will show that gentlemen miss the mark when they condemn those who now endeavor to carry a post to the mouth of the Yellow Stone. But the distance is still objected to. Eighteen hundred miles beyond the Mississippi makes, indeed, an appalling sound. But that is by water, following the bends of the river. The Rocky Mountains are but nine hundred miles from the Mississippi; and a post at the Yellow Stone will be within supporting distances of the Falls of St. Anthony and the Council Bluffs. The smallness of the amount required for the transport of the troops is objected to; doubtless the objection would also come if the amount was large. But the accuracy of the estimate is disputed. Thirteen thousand dollars is said to be too little for the object. I answer, that the estimate is made by the Quartermaster General, upon the basis that the troops will move in their own boats. It is supported by the fact that the expedition of Colonel Leavenworth cost but $4,000. Every one acquainted with the movement of troops upon the Western rivers in their own boats, can bear witness to the smallness of the sums required for such expeditions. But it is said that the troops cannot be sustained after they are carried to the post. Such a statement derogates from the power of this Government. Look to the British companies. They have upwards of three thousand men in their service, stretched across the continent, from the frontiers of Canada to the mouth of the Columbia river, occupying a line of posts farther north than the mouth of the Yellow Stone, in a climate more inhospitable than on the banks of the Missouri, and without the advantage of a direct communication by water, either with each other, or with the settlements in Canada. Yet these three thousand men are sustained; some of the posts they occupy have been kept up for forty years; all this has been done by a company of fur traders; and shall it be admitted that the power of the United States is inadequate to the support of four companies upon the Upper Missouri? But why object to a distance of one thousand eight hundred miles—to an expense of $13,000, when we send a ship of war annually to the coast of Africa, three thousand miles, and vote $50,000 per annum to protect our deported negroes from the depredations of their fellow-countrymen? Gentlemen suppose that an exhibition of force is not necessary among these Indians. They labor under a great mistake. The savage respects power, and nothing else. The Arab of the desert, and the Blackfoot of the Saskatchewan, act upon the same principle. Each considers the merchant and the traveller as his lawful prey, and they kill and rob him if they can.

Mr. DICKERSON conceived it his duty to answer to some part of the remarks that had just been made. He was not the eulogist of the British traders, or British fur companies. He had said, that, if the Indians prefer trading with them, it is because their confidence is gained by kind treatment and fair dealing. As to the hostile views of those traders and companies towards us, he had said not one word. He had not attempted to justify them. As to the quarrels between the rival British fur companies, they are of no importance to us. If they make war upon each other, it is their concern, not ours. If they murdered Governor Semple, that was no act of hostility towards the United States, nor towards the Indians. It has no bearing upon the subject before the Senate.

I do not think the killing of the two American Indians has been satisfactorily accounted for. Surely they were not killed because there had been hostility between Governor Lewis and some of the tribes of Indians, or because it had been necessary to smuggle a Mandan chief around the Ricara villages, fifteen or sixteen years ago; or because twelve men had been killed, under Lisa, long since. It is probable they were killed in some attack which they were rash enough to make on the trappers and hunters of the Missouri Fur Company. The Ricaras probably thought that their young men were justifiable; and, although they professed to have forgotten and forgiven the supposed injury, it is very evident they had done neither.

Information of the circumstances which I have stated, to show that General Ashley and his company, as well as the Missouri Fur Company, were engaged in trapping and hunting in the Indian territories, was not derived from the letter from the West, published in all our papers, and which the gentleman from Missouri asserts was a tissue of falsehoods. It was derived from a source entitled to the highest respect. It was derived from the documents transmitted to us by the President of the United States, with his message of the 2d of December last. The part respecting General Ashley, is in a letter of General Atkinson, page 83, of those documents—and the part respecting the Missouri Fur Company, in page 71 of those documents; in a letter from William Gordon, upon whom the gentleman from Missouri has pronounced the highest eulogium. What was said of the interference of the Missouri Fur Company, to prevent a peace with the Ricaras, and of the burning their towns, by this same Mr. Gordon, and a Mr. McDonald, may be found in the same document, page 95.

The system of intercourse with the Indian tribes lately pursued is radically wrong. The British trading and fur companies are not supported by the armed force of the British Government; they have no means of insuring success but by treating the Indians kindly, and dealing with them fairly. When our traders do the same, they will meet with equal success.

Mr. SMITH spoke in favor of allowing more time for investigation and inquiry, and was opposed to the passage of the bill at the present time.

Mr. KING, of New York, said, he believed, if we intended to invade the country of the Indians with a military force, we ought to hold a treaty with them, and obtain their consent to the measure. We had no right to do it without their consent. He requested the gentleman from Missouri to give him some information upon this subject. He wished to know, also, if the Indian tribes had not a right to conquer and occupy each other's territory. If the tribe of Blackfeet had come from Canada, and conquered and taken possession of the country of another tribe, he wished to know what right the United States had to interfere in the business. He wished to be informed, too, whether we have any right to prevent those Indians from going where they choose—into Canada, or elsewhere—to trade for their furs. These were important questions upon these points—and Mr. K. said, he believed there had never been any correct understanding on the subject. He presumed there was no distinct law respecting it. These Indian tribes do not come within our jurisdiction; our laws do not control them—even when they commit murders, they are not amenable to our laws. It has always been the practice of the Indians to go from one country to another; it is their habit to wander over the wilderness, from place to place. Mr. K. said, he wished to see the principle by which we were going to make provisions like those contained in this bill. We must make some treaty with the Indians before we can do it. Can we send a military force into their territory without their consent? Mr. K. believed we had never yet done it. We have power to make arrangements with them for the security of our trade with them—but this bill does more—it goes to restrain their trade, and exclude all others from it but ourselves. Mr. K. said, he would agree to all the other provisions of the bill, but that which provided for the sending of troops into the Indian countries. He must know more about it before he would consent to that. He had merely suggested these ideas, to call forth further information on the preliminary ground, as to our right to take the course proposed in the bill. He wished, also, to know what prohibitions were to be introduced, to regulate our trade with the Indians.

Mr. BENTON rose to answer the questions proposed to him by the Senator from New York. It had been the practice of the Government to establish military posts in the Indian country without their consent. The practice had obtained under every Administration. All the frontier States and Territories were full of examples. Without going into an enumeration of instances, which might be forgotten and disputed, he would state one, known to us all, sanctioned by us all, and up to the point of the gentleman's inquiry—he alluded to the post at the Council Bluffs. It was established four years ago, under the orders of the President, and had secured the annual sanction of both Houses of Congress, in annual appropriations to its support. Yet this post was established upon Indian territory, without their consent, and is maintained without it. Further, Mr. B. said, the Senate, in its capacity of adviser to the President, in its treaty-making power, had decided the same question. He spoke of the Senate's refusal to ratify the treaty made to extinguish the Indian title to fifteen square miles of territory to include the fort and fields at the Council Bluffs. The injunction of secrecy had been removed from the Senate's proceedings upon that treaty. The Journal would show that the distinguished Senator from New York had voted against its ratification. His own high authority might, therefore, be quoted against himself, in answer to the first question which he had put. In addition to all this, may be quoted the provisions of the act of 1802. It is our code of Indian laws, enacted under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, and turns, in every clause, upon the assertion of the principle that the Indians are not independent nations; that our jurisdiction extends over their soil, and over their acts; and that our troops may be sent into their country, without their consent, as often as our policy requires it to be done.

The second interrogatory put by the Senator from New York, related to our right to interfere in the affairs of the Indians "among themselves." Mr. B. said, that there was no part of the bill, under discussion, which asserted such a right, or proposed to exercise it. He, therefore, claimed the indulgence of the gentleman from New York, in declining to answer a question not relevant to the matter in hand.

The third interrogatory inquired for the terms, prohibitions, and regulations, proposed to be put into the projected treaties. Here again, Mr. B. adverted to the separation of power between the Congress and the Executive. We vote the appropriation for defraying the expense of holding the treaties; the President conducts the negotiations. If treaties are made, the Senate's power over their stipulations then commences. It can refuse to ratify, if it disapproves. The bill on the table was sufficiently indicative of the object of the treaties, by the description of "trade and friendship." All the rest is given, by the Constitution, to the Executive authority.

Mr. KING, of New York, dissented entirely from the observations made by the gentleman from Missouri. He (Mr. K.) did not believe there was any authority whatever, for placing a military force in the Indian country, in a time of peace. In his opinion, we had no right to do it. He had never voted for carrying troops there. The treaty to which the gentleman alluded, was rejected upon other grounds. If we are at war with the Indians, Mr. K. said, it would be different; but, while we remain at peace with them, we have no right to adopt such a measure.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said he must confess he was somewhat ignorant of this subject. Members could not be supposed to be able to inquire into, and inform themselves upon every subject, before it came up for discussion. He believed his honorable friend from New Jersey did not deserve the censure bestowed upon him by the gentleman from Missouri. It was not wonderful that he was not as well acquainted with the subject as that gentleman. If it had been a bill respecting the cod or mackerel fishery, Mr. H. apprehended that the gentleman from Missouri himself would not have understood the business so well as he appeared to at present. Mr. H. was apprehensive that the whole story was not told. Every thing that was said, in relation to our affairs with the Indians, was on one side. The poor Indian has no one here to speak for him. There is nobody to tell us when the United States are wrong, and the Indians are right. The gentleman from New Jersey has produced some official facts on the subject, which remain yet unanswered. Mr. H. believed the transactions of General Ashley were not altogether right on his part. He said he was in favor of the indefinite postponement of this bill; but, as gentlemen seemed to prefer that it should lie on the table, he would not propose its postponement. He understood the object of the bill to be, to protect our trade with the Northwestern Indians, by a military force. This subject had once been fully discussed and settled, if not in this House of Congress, it had in the other, when the Yellow Stone Expedition was under consideration. It was then settled. The principle agreed upon was, that protection should be furnished to our actual settlements, by posting troops in advance of them; but that the traders who were in advance of those posts should be left to protect themselves. He would say one word on the subject of advancing a military force into the Indian country without their consent. While we recognise them as sovereign powers, and treat with them, we have no right to do it. We certainly ought not to carry a military force among them, while we admit their competency to make treaties. As long as we allow them that right, we ought to respect them. If we have a right to take one acre of their land, for the establishment of a military post, we have a right to take ten, twenty, or thirty acres; and we may thus take their whole territory. Have we a right to exercise this power so long as we acknowledge their right to treat with us? Mr. H. adverted to the treaty made at the Council Bluffs, which had been spoken of. He said that treaty neither asserted nor denied our right to establish military posts in the Indian territory. The treaty was rejected, because it was not made by the lawful authority. It had no bearing on this question. He would either make no treaties with the Indians, or he would use them as we do other nations, with whom we treat. How would any European nation like it, if we were to march a military force into their country? If we admit their right to treat, we have no right to advance a military force into their country, in time of peace. It had been our policy to restrict our forces to a certain distance beyond the actual settlements. Mr. H. had no faith in the economy with which the gentleman from Missouri had supposed this transaction would be completed. If we establish this post, we shall have an estimate from the Secretary of War, the next year, for additional appropriations for its support. He (Mr. H.) was not inclined to trust entirely to the statement of the expense, which had already been furnished. Intermediate posts would be required, for the support of this. It would require at least two regiments of troops. This would take too large a proportion from our small Army. When these objections were taken into consideration, he trusted the bill would be rejected.

Mr. BARTON then offered a new section, by way of amendment, as a substitute for the third section of the bill. The amendment was ordered to be printed; the bill was laid upon the table.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned until tomorrow.

THURSDAY, April 1.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the petition of A. V. Mattson, representing that he has been for nearly eight months, and now is, confined in the jail of Alleghany county, in the State of Pennsylvania, for debt, which he is unable to pay; that, by the absence from the State of the district judge, he is precluded from the benefit of the insolvent law; and that the act passed at the present session of Congress for his relief is defective; which he prays may be remedied. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. L. also submitted documents in relation to the surveys and sales of the public lands; and they were ordered to be printed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia,'" and concurred therein.

The engrossed bill altering the times of holding the courts in the District of Columbia, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill confirming certain acts of James Miller, as Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Shields was read the second time.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN GEORGIA.

The following Message was yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to Congress certain papers enumerated in a report from the Secretary of War, relating to the compact between the United States and the State of Georgia, entered into in 1802, whereby the latter ceded to the former a portion of the territory then within its limits, on the conditions therein specified. By the 4th article of that compact, it was stipulated that the United States should, at their own expense, extinguish, for the use of Georgia, the Indian title to all the lands within the State, as soon as it might be done peaceably and on reasonable conditions. These papers show the measures adopted by the Executive of the United States, in fulfilment of the several conditions of the compact, from its date to the present time, and particularly the negotiations and treaties with the Indian tribes for the extinguishment of their title, with an estimate of the number of acres purchased, and sums paid for the lands they acquired. They show, also, the state in which this interesting concern now rests with the Cherokees, one of the tribes within the State, and the inability of the Executive to make any further movement with this tribe, without the special sanction of Congress.

I have full confidence that my predecessors exerted their best endeavors to execute this compact in all its parts, of which, indeed, the sums paid, and the lands acquired during their respective terms, in fulfilment of its several stipulations, are a full proof. I have also been animated, since I came into this office, with the same zeal, from an anxious desire to meet the wishes of the State, and in the hope that, by the establishment of these tribes beyond the Mississippi, their improvement in civilization; their security, and happiness, would be promoted. By the paper bearing date on the 30th of January last, which was communicated to the Chiefs of the Cherokee nation in this city, who came to protest against any further appropriations of money for holding treaties with them, the obligation imposed on the United States, by the compact with Georgia, to extinguish the Indian title to the right of soil within the State, and the incompatibility with our system, of their existence as a distinct community within any State, were pressed with the utmost earnestness. It was proposed to them, at the same time, to procure and convey to them territory beyond the Mississippi, in exchange for that which they hold within the limits of Georgia, or to pay them for it its value in money. To this proposal, their answer, which bears date 11th of February following, gives an unqualified refusal. By this it is manifest that, at the present time, and in their present temper, they can be removed only by force, to which, should it be deemed proper, the power of the Executive is incompetent.

I have no hesitation, however, to declare it as my opinion, that the Indian title was not affected in the slightest circumstance by the compact with Georgia, and that there is no obligation on the United States to remove the Indians by force. The express stipulation of the compact, that their title should be extinguished at the expense of the United States, when it may be done peaceably and on reasonable conditions, is a full proof that it was the clear and distinct understanding of both parties to it, that the Indians had a right to the territory, in the disposal of which they were to be regarded as free agents. An attempt to remove them by force would, in my opinion, be unjust. In the future measures to be adopted in regard to the Indians within our limits, and in consequence, within the limits of any State, the United States have duties to perform, and a character to sustain, to which they ought not to be indifferent. At an early period, their improvement in the arts of civilized life was made an object with the Government, and that has since been persevered in. This policy was dictated by motives of humanity to the aborigines of the country, and under a firm conviction that the right to adopt and pursue it was equally applicable to all the tribes within our limits.

My impression is equally strong that it would promote essentially the security and happiness of the tribes within our limits, if they could be prevailed on to retire west and north of our States and Territories, on lands to be procured for them by the United States, in exchange for those on which they now reside. Surrounded as they are, and pressed as they will be, on every side, by the white population, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for them, with their kind of Government, to sustain order among them. Their interior will be exposed to frequent disturbances, to remedy which, the interposition of the United States will be indispensable, and thus their Government will gradually lose its authority, until it is annihilated. In this process, the moral character of the tribes will also be lost, since the change will be too rapid to admit their improvement in civilization, to enable them to institute and sustain a Government founded on our principles, if such a change were compatible either with the compact with Georgia, or with our general system, or to become members of a State, should any State be willing to adopt them in such numbers, regarding the good order, peace, and tranquillity, of such State. But all these evils may be avoided, if these tribes will consent to remove beyond the limits of our present States and Territories. Lands equally good, and perhaps more fertile, may be procured for them in those quarters; the relations between the United States and such Indians would still be the same. Considerations of humanity and benevolence, which have now great weight, would operate, in that event, with an augmented force; since we should feel sensibly the obligation imposed on us by the accommodation which they thereby afforded us. Placed at ease, as the United States would then be, the improvement of those tribes in civilization, and in all the arts and usages of civilized life, would become the part of a general system, which might be adopted on great consideration, and in which every portion of our Union would then take an equal interest. These views have steadily been pursued by the Executive, and the means which have been placed at its disposal, have been so applied, in the manner best calculated, according to its judgment, to produce this desirable result, as will appear by the documents which accompany the report of the Secretary of War.

I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, under a high sense of its importance, and of the propriety of an early decision on it. This compact gives a claim to the State, which ought to be executed, in all its conditions, with perfect good faith. In doing this, however, it is the duty of the United States to regard its strict import, and to make no sacrifice of their interest, not called for by the compact, nor contemplated by either of the parties, when it was entered into, nor to commit any breach of right or of humanity in regard to the Indians, repugnant to the judgment, and revolting to the feelings, of the whole American people. I submit the subject to your consideration, in full confidence that you will duly weigh the obligations of the compact with Georgia, its import in all its parts, and the extent to which the United States are bound to go, under it. I submit it with equal confidence, that you will also weigh the nature of the Indian title to the territory within the limits of any State, with the stipulations in the several treaties with this tribe, respecting territory held by it within the State of Georgia, and decide whether any measure, on the part of Congress, is called for at the present time, and what such measure shall be, if any is deemed expedient.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1824.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 29, 1824.

SIR: In obedience to your order, directing me to furnish a statement of the facts and circumstances connected with the execution of the fourth article of the convention between the United States and Georgia, of the second of April, 1802, in which the former stipulates "to extinguish, at their own expense, for the use of Georgia, as early as the same can be peaceably obtained, upon reasonable terms, the Indian title to the lands lying within the limits of that State," I have the honor to make the following report:

By the convention above referred to, Georgia ceded to the United States all the lands lying south of the State of Tennessee, and west of the Chatahoochee river, and a line drawn from the mouth of the Uchee creek direct to the Nicotak, on the Tennessee river. In consideration of this cession, the United States stipulated to pay the State of Georgia $1,250,000, and obligated themselves, in the manner above stated, to extinguish the Indian title within the limits of the State. The convention also provides for the adjustment of the Yazoo claims, which were afterwards provided for by the act of Congress, approved March 31, 1814.

At the date of the convention, the Indians owned, within the limits of Georgia, 25,980,000 acres, of which 19,578,890 acres belonged to the Creeks, and 7,152,110 acres to the Cherokees, which tribes owned, besides, a considerable extent of country in the States of Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina. Between both of those tribes and the United States there were subsisting treaties, at the time of the date of the convention, which, among other things, fixed the limits of their respective territories, and guaranteed to them the lands within those limits. (See 1st vol. United States Laws—treaty with the Creek Indians, p. 361, art. 5. Treaty with the Creeks, ratified 7th August, 1790. Same, page 327, treaty of Holston, 1791, art. 7. Same, page 332, treaty of 1798, near Tellico, articles 1 and 2.)

In fulfilment of the stipulation of the fourth article with Georgia, there has been held seven treaties with the Creeks and Cherokees; of which five were with the former; two of which were previous to the late war with Great Britain, in 1812, and three since. By the two preceding the declaration of war, there were ceded to Georgia 2,713,890 acres, and by the three latter, 11,735,590 acres, making together 14,748,690 acres. With the Cherokees, there have been held two treaties, both since the late war, by which Georgia has acquired 995,310 acres, which, added to that acquired by treaties with the Creek nation, make 15,744,000 acres, that have been ceded to Georgia since the date of the convention, in fulfilment of its stipulations.

In acquiring these cessions for the State of Georgia, the United States have expended $958,954 90; to which should be added, the value of 995,310 acres, which were given in exchange with the Cherokees, on the Arkansas river, for a quantity ceded by the Cherokees to Georgia, by the treaties of 1817 and 1819, which lands, estimated at the minimum price of the public lands, would make $1,244,147 50. If to these we add the sum of $1,250,000, paid to Georgia under the convention, and $4,282,151 12½, paid to the Yazoo claimants, it will be found that the United States have already paid, under the convention $7,735,243 52½, which does not include any portion of the expense of the Creek war, by which upwards of seven millions of acres were acquired to the State of Georgia.

The United States have ever been solicitous to fulfil, at the earliest period, the obligation of the convention, by the extinguishment of the Indian titles within the limits of Georgia; a most satisfactory proof of which may be found in the number of treaties which have been held for that purpose, the quantity of lands which have been acquired, and the price paid. In fact, such has been the solicitude of the Government, that but little regard has been had to the price, whenever it has been found possible to obtain a cession of lands to the State. The price given has far exceeded that which has ever been given in other purchases from the Indians.

I feel satisfied that it may be asserted, with confidence, that no opportunity of extinguishing the Indian titles, "on reasonable terms," has been neglected to be embraced by the United States.

It may be proper to notice, more particularly, the treaty of Fort Jackson, of 1814, with the Creek Indians; and those of 1817 and 1819, with the Cherokees, as, under those treaties, lands were ceded, not only within the limits of Georgia, but also in the neighboring States of Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina, which may require some explanation.

It may be proper to premise, that, previous to the late war, the four most powerful and numerous tribes of Indians, the Creeks, Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, lay contiguous to one another, and were situated on the weakest portion of our frontier. They contained, at the period referred to, a population of between sixty and seventy thousand, and could raise at least 15,000 warriors. During the late war with Great Britain, great anxiety was felt in relation to those numerous and powerful tribes, and, although all, except the Creeks, remained at peace, it is believed there was a strong tendency towards hostility among some of the other tribes. The Creeks commenced hostility at a critical period of the war, and created a powerful diversion of our resources, both of men and money; but, by a vigorous prosecution of the war, they were reduced, after many and severe losses. The treaty of Fort Jackson followed. They were a conquered people, and treated as such; and such terms were imposed as considerations of public policy dictated.

The advantage that would result by separating those powerful Southern tribes from one another, and from the Territory of Florida, at that time a foreign province, were among the most obvious dictates of policy, as it would effectually guard against the possible future combination of those tribes, and prevent the liability to hostility, which almost invariably results from the intercourse of Indian tribes with a foreign territory. The Creek Indians were required to make the cession of lands to the United States, in such a manner as to effect those important objects; and, accordingly, the United States acquired a large cession in what is now the State of Alabama, which separated the Creeks and Cherokees from the Chickasaws and Choctaws; and a cession, in the southern part of Georgia, which separated the Creeks from the province of Florida.

It was not conceived that there was any thing in the stipulation of the convention with Georgia, which prevented the United States from pursuing those views of national policy. The obligation of the United States extends only to the purchase of lands within the limits of Georgia, so soon as it could be done upon "peaceable and reasonable terms." The lands were acquired by conquest, and not by purchase, which left the nation at liberty to pursue those views of policy which have been stated, and which, it is believed, has tended strongly to give security and strength to the most vulnerable portion of the country.

In noticing the treaties of 1817 and 1819, it may be proper to premise that, as far back as the year 1804, a delegation from the Cherokee nation, then at the Seat of Government, were informed by Mr. Jefferson, if the Cherokees, or any portion of them, thought proper to emigrate to the Arkansas, they should receive as much land as they were entitled to in proportion to their numbers, on the east of the Mississippi. Under the sanction of this promise, and tempted by the abundance of game, emigration continued from the Cherokee nation, in small parties, to the Arkansas, until 1817. The number being then considerable, a commission was constituted to treat with the Cherokee nation, on the basis of the arrangement made by Mr. Jefferson, which was followed by the treaty of the 8th July, 1817, which, among other things, stipulated that a census of the Cherokee nation should be taken in June following, and that a portion of the country should be ceded to the United States, equal to that which those who emigrated to the Arkansas were entitled to; that is to say, if it was found that one-third had emigrated, one-third of the territory should be ceded, and so in any other proportion, according to the number that should emigrate. To carry the treaty into effect, Congress appropriated, by the act of the 20th April, 1818, the sum of $80,000, in order to defray the expenses that might be attendant on the emigration of the Cherokees to the Arkansas; and Joseph McMinn, Esq., then Governor of Tennessee, was appointed agent to carry the treaty into effect. It was found, however, impossible to take the census as proposed by the treaty, in June, and various causes delayed its final execution until the beginning of the year 1819. In the meantime, the emigration of the Cherokees was incessantly urged by all the means in possession of the Government.

It was the desire of the Government that the whole nation should emigrate, under the belief that it would be better for the Indians, as well as ourselves; and no effort on the part of the Government was left untried to induce them to emigrate. A large portion of the nation, however, were so decidedly opposed to it, that it was found impossible to carry this policy of the Government into effect.

The appropriation being finally exhausted, a delegation of the Cherokee nation was permitted to visit the Seat of Government in 1819, in order to close the treaty of 1817. It was ascertained that about one-third part of the nation had emigrated, or enrolled to emigrate, to the Arkansas; and the delegation proposed to treat upon that basis, which was acceded to. It only remained to fix on the portion of territory to be ceded. With the view of throwing the land to be ceded within the limits of Georgia, and to separate the Creek and Cherokee nations, the Government proposed, that all the lands lying south and east of Etowah, one of the main branches of the Coosa river, should be ceded by the Cherokees; but it was found impossible to induce the delegation to yield to that proposition, or to any other, more favorable to Georgia, than that which was adopted. They were fixed in their determination, particularly, not to be separated from the Creek nation, by an intervening white population, and to cover their northern boundary by the Tennessee river, which necessarily threw the cession, made by the treaty, into Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina, as well as Georgia. Since the treaty of 1819, two attempts have been made, under appropriations of Congress, to open a negotiation with the Cherokee nation, for further cession, both of which have proved abortive.

During the present Winter, a delegation of the principal chiefs of the Cherokee nation visited the Seat of Government, and the opportunity was seized to make known to them the sentiments of the Government, upon the subject of additional cessions, in order to fulfil the stipulation of the convention with Georgia.

It cannot be doubted, that much of the difficulty of acquiring additional cessions from the Cherokee nation, and the other Southern tribes, results from their growing civilization and knowledge by which they have learned to place a higher value upon their lands than more rude and savage tribes. Many causes have contributed to place them higher in the scale of civilization than other Indians within our limits. Lying in large masses, they do not feel that depression, which is invariably felt by small and detached tribes in the neighborhood of the whites. In addition to which, we may add the genial nature of their climate, which enables them to pass more readily from the hunter to the herdsman state; and the fertility of their soil, and the value of their staple articles, particularly cotton. To these, however, must be added the humane and benevolent policy of the Government, which has ever directed a fostering care to the Indians within our limits. This policy is as old as the Government itself; and has been habitually and strongly extended to the Cherokee nation.

By the fourteenth article of the treaty of Holston, in the year 1791, it is stipulated, "that the Cherokee nation may be led to a greater degree of civilization, and to become herdsmen and cultivators, instead of remaining in a state of hunters, the United States will, from time to time, furnish, gratuitously, the said nation with useful implements of husbandry; and, further to assist the said nation in so desirable a pursuit, and, at the same time, to establish a certain mode of communication, the United States will send such and so many persons to reside in said nation, as they may judge proper, not exceeding four in number, who shall qualify themselves to act as interpreters. These persons shall have lands assigned by the Cherokees, for cultivation, for themselves, and their successors in office; but they shall be precluded exercising any kind of traffic."

In conformity to the provisions of this article, the various utensils of husbandry have been abundantly and constantly distributed to the Cherokee nation, which has resulted in creating a taste for farming, and the comforts of civilized life. This humane policy of the Government, since the termination of the late war, has taken, in some degree, a new direction. Certain benevolent societies, in the year 1816, applied for permission to make establishments among the Cherokees, and other Southern tribes, for the purpose of educating and instructing them in the arts of civilized life. Their application was favorably received. The experiment proved so favorable that Congress, by the act of 3d March, 1819, appropriated $10,000, annually, as a civilization fund, which has been applied in such a manner as very considerably to increase the extent and usefulness of the efforts of benevolent individuals, and to advance the work of Indian civilization.

In performing the high duties of humanity to the wretched aborigines of our country, it has never been conceived, that the stipulation of the convention with Georgia, to extinguish the Indian title within her limits, was contravened. The Government has been actuated solely by a desire to perform the obligation, which considerations of humanity imposed on us, in relation to these unfortunate people. Their situation, at best, is wretched, and can only be rendered tolerable, by the perpetual exercise of that humanity, kindness, and justice, which has ever characterized the acts of the Government, towards them.

Indian Reservations in Georgia.

SENATE.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE U. S.

[Accompanying this report, are nearly a hundred pages of documentary matter, from which the following is selected as presenting the view of the subject which is entertained by the Representatives of the State of Georgia.]

To the President of the United States :

The Secretary of War has addressed to the gentlemen composing the Georgia delegation to Congress, copies of the extraordinary documents furnished by persons who are called the Cherokee Delegation. As this is believed to be the first instance in which a diplomatic correspondence has been held with Indian Chiefs, and in which they have been addressed by the Department of War in the same terms with those used to the Representation of a State, it becomes a subject of inquiry in what light the Cherokees are at present viewed by the Government of the United States. If as an independent nation, to be treated with by all the forms of diplomatic respect, the negotiation with them should be transferred to the Department of State, and will, no doubt, be preceded by a proper examination into their authority to speak for the Cherokee tribe, on matters affecting its prosperity and existence. If to be viewed as other Indians ; as persons suffered to reside within the territorial limits of the United States, and subject to every restraint which the policy and power of the General Government require to be imposed upon them, for the interest of the Union, the interest of a particular State, and their own preservation, it is necessary that these misguided men should be taught by the General Government that there is no alternative between their removal beyond the limits of the State of Georgia and their extinction. The Government of the United States will deceive them grossly if they are led to believe that, at this day, their consent is necessary to the fulfilment of its obligations to the State of Georgia. Their will must yield to the paramount duties of the General Government to itself and to each member of the Confederacy. The Cherokees allege (if, indeed, the representation made is made with their authority) that they are resolved neither to leave nor sell their lands on which they reside—lands which belong to the State of Georgia ; over which Georgia did claim sovereignty until the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and over which she will exercise her powers whenever any Administration of the General Government resolves to fix permanently upon them any persons who are not, and whom she will never suffer to become, her citizens. The doctrines of the General Government, sanctioned by the highest tribunals, vindicate the claim of Georgia to the ownership of the soil. The Indians are simply occupants—tenants at will—incapable of transferring even their naked possession, except through the instrumentality of the United States, to the State of Georgia. Aware of the tenure by which their temporary possession is held, their head men have sought, in many instances, to secure from the United States a title to the soil itself. Stipulations have been entered into by the General Government equally contradictory to rights of Georgia, and the obligations of the United States ; stipulations, however, which show that the General Government have the acknowledged right to transfer the possession of the Cherokee lands to the State of Georgia. The power which takes from the Cherokee tribe a portion of soil to confer it on a Cherokee chief, under a different tenure, can rightfully take from the Cherokee nation for the benefit of a State.

It is with deep concern that the necessity is felt of pressing upon the General Government the considerations that are due to its character for good faith in its contracts with a member of the Union. Since the year 1802, implicit reliance has been placed in the General Government ; and the just expectation has been indulged that, in the execution of its high duties, the Executive administration would carefully and steadily pursue the object for which the faith of the Union was pledged—the peaceable extinguishment, on reasonable terms, of the Indian title to all the lands within the territorial limits of Georgia. In 1817, the public declaration of the President to Congress, that an arrangement had been made, by which, in exchange for lands beyond the Mississippi, a great part, if not the whole, of the lands possessed by the Cherokee tribe eastward of that river in the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, and Georgia, and in the Territory of Alabama, would be soon acquired, gave a just expectation that the national pledge given to Georgia would be redeemed. In the eight years which have succeeded, these anticipations of the President have been realized everywhere but in Georgia. The successive purchases made since that period have crowded the Cherokees out of Tennessee, North Carolina, and Alabama, almost altogether into Georgia ; and the terms upon which they have been made, have created all the difficulties now encountered in the peaceful acquisition, on reasonable terms, of the lands upon which the Cherokees are now permitted to remain ; difficulties which are every hour increasing, from the policy pursued by the General Government.

It is with all due respect a subject of serious inquiry, what produced the extraordinary change in the wishes of the Cherokee tribe, as expressed in the treaty of 1817 ? How it happened that the Cherokees of the upper towns, most of whom were without the limits of Georgia, and who desired to be permanently fixed on the lands upon which they then lived, were induced, in 1819, to abandon their designs, and many of them to become inhabitants of the region beyond the Mississippi, while the Cherokees of the lower towns, (most of them within the State of Georgia) anxiously desiring to remove in 1817, were, in 1819, tempted to remain, and filled with the desire of a permanent establishment there ? The same exertions which produced this, can effect another change ; can induce the remnant still in the limits of Georgia, to follow their brethren to the West, to a territory which the General Government can rightfully bestow upon them as a temporary or permanent property, without interfering with the right or encroaching upon the sovereignty of any State. Argument is not necessary to show, that a Power which interposes obstacles to the accomplishment of its own promises, violates its faith ; and that, to plead the impossibility to perform an engagement when that impossibility is produced by those who engaged to perform it, would be equally dishonorable and hypocritical. The President is probably not aware that the United States will be liable to such accusations, if the present moment is suffered to pass without a full compliance on their part, with the obligations of the treaty of cession of 1802. What has created the strong desire of the Cherokee Indians to remain where they are ? The policy of the General Government ; the pretended guarantees of their possessions; the attempted changes in the nature of their titles to them; the lessons received from their masters in the arts of civilized life; the acquisition of property and the desire of extending and securing it; a policy just and generous to the Indians, but solely at the expense of a member of the Union; at war, not less with the rights of that member of the Union, than with the solemn promises of the General Government. The United States have the same right to colonize a tribe of Indians from the Columbia or Red river, in Georgia, as they have to pursue a system of policy whose aim or end shall be the permanency of the Cherokees within that State.

If the Cherokees are unwilling to remove, the causes of that unwillingness are to be traced to the United States. If a peaceable purchase cannot be made in the ordinary mode, nothing remains to be done but to order their removal to a designated territory beyond the limits of Georgia, and giving an ample equivalent for the Territory left by them, and an ample support to the territory granted to them. An order of this kind will not be disregarded by the Cherokee tribe, whose interest will be essentially promoted by a compliance with it, (whatever may be the effect of it upon a few chief men, who seem to consider their own interest as separate and distinct from that of their brethren,) as it must be obvious that a tranquil and undisturbed possession of a permanent property can alone enable them to acquire the arts of civilized life, and to secure to them its benefits.

Our duty is performed by remonstrating against the policy heretofore pursued, by which the interests of Georgia have been disregarded, to the accomplishment of other objects of general interest; and a compliance with a solemn promise postponed, for the acquisition of territory for the General Government; and by insisting, as we do, most earnestly, upon an immediate fulfilment of the obligations of the articles of cession, concluded in 1802, as the only means by which justice can be done to the State we represent, and the character of the General Government be vindicated.

The Message was read, and laid on the table.

PURCHASERS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, then proceeded to consider the bill "for the relief of purchasers of public lands."

Mr. KING, of Alabama, proposed sundry amendments to the details of the bill. Some cursory remarks were made upon these amendments, by Messrs. CHANDLER and KING, of Alabama, and the amendments were agreed to. Mr. KING, of Alabama, then moved to strike out the second, third, and fourth sections of the bill. Mr. RUGGLES was in favor of retaining the second section; and Mr. KING withdrew his resolution, in order to give way to an amendment proposed by Mr. RUGGLES; upon which some discussion took place between Messrs. RUGGLES, KING, of New York, LOWRIE, NOBLE, and KING, of Alabama, and it was then adopted. Mr. KING, of Alabama, then renewed his motion to strike out the third and fourth sections of the bill; which was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; the several amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred in; and the bill was postponed, and made the order of the day for tomorrow.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, the bill "providing for the settlement of pecuniary claims against the United States," was taken up for consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke in support of the bill. He adverted to the numerous evils of deciding private pecuniary claims against the United States in Congress—he conceived that it could not be difficult to find a remedy. There was no individual who must not be convinced of the impropriety of deciding trivial claims by Congress. Such trials diminished the dignity of the Legislature, and would be likely to avert from it the affections of the people. It would save the time of Congress, to be directed to higher objects, such as the important reports from the different offices. Matters of importance were so mingled up with trivialities, that sufficient attention was not paid to them. It had been suggested that a board of commissioners ought to be appointed for this purpose. This plan was not liable to so many objections as their trial by Congress, but this would have its attendant evils. At present, rejected claims cost more than those which are allowed. Many are acknowledged to be bad; but yet, year after year, they are before Congress. In this respect a board of commissioners would be better than Congress. It is said that the people have always a right to petition Congress. He denied the position. To obtain the passage of general laws they might have that right; but not to make repeated appeals on private claims. He spoke of the practice in courts of justice, where claims, when once decided, could not again be brought up. It was not consonant with the principles of liberty to allow these ex parte trials; in which a case was too often gained by teasing, rather than by its justice. The practice was, as Mr. T. thought, at variance with the Constitution. The United States could not prefer a petition to Congress, to obtain pay of an individual. One party, then, had a recourse which the other had not. This court ought to be equally open to all parties.

Mr. T. then took up the bill and read it, section by section, to show the merits of each.

The first section provides, that every claimant against the United States shall have the right to bring forward all his claims, whether legal or equitable, in any district or circuit court in the United States. Mr. T. held that this would be much better for the claimants—they would be tried at home—and, although there would be no impartiality or incongruity in the judgments, yet equal justice would be done. Justice would also be done to the United States. The accounts must be first submitted to the accounting officers, and if the claimant afterwards should see fit to bring an action, in the nature of a suit of chancery, he may do it, and that court is to be furnished with a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, of the reasons upon which the claim was rejected by the Department.

The second section provides, said Mr. T., a substantial regulation for the attainment of justice, the witnesses in the case are to be regularly examined and questioned by the Attorney General, an impartial person. This, Mr. T. said, would be vastly better than the practice, now pursued, of taking such kind of evidence as was taken by Congress, which, if it deserved the name, was only ex parte. He did not propose to plunge into a system which could not be remedied afterwards.

The third section provides for empannelling a jury, when there should be such circumstances as, in the opinion of the court, should require a jury to try facts.

The fourth section gives the Attorney General the power to file suggestions or interrogatories to the claimants—the facts suggested to be taken as truth if not properly answered. This, Mr. T. said, was similar to a cross bill in chancery—it was to operate when there was a fraudulent concealment of facts.

The fifth section gives the claimant a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, without bond to prosecute the suit; furnishing the creditor with every possible advantage which could be expected to be allowed.

The sixth section provides that the officers of the court shall be paid for services performed for claimants, but no costs to be rendered against the claimants in case the suit is dismissed, except for counsel.

Mr. T. hoped the observations he had made would be duly weighed, and that the bill would be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said, he was too timid a politician to wish to go very deep, at first, into any new plans of government. He wished to propose another amendment, to limit the time of the operation of the bill. He proposed a new section, to limit the continuance of the bill to three years. This was agreed to.

An amendment was adopted, to include the District of Columbia in the provisions of the bill.

The blank in the bill, limiting the amount of any claim to come within the provisions of this bill, was filled with $3,000.

The blank, fixing the amount of any claims which should be allowed an appeal to the Supreme Court, was then moved to be filled with $1,000.

Mr. LOWRIE thought that cases, involving great principles, might come before the courts below, though the amount of the claim might be small. He thought there ought not to be any limit to the right of appeal.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, replied to Mr. LOWRIE. He was in favor of limiting the amount upon which an appropriation should be made.

It was then determined to fill the blank with $500.

Mr. MACON made a few remarks on the bill, to which Mr. TAYLOR replied.

Mr. CHANDLER thought that the claimant ought to pay the costs of his suit, the expenses of juries, &c., as well as his counsel. To this objection Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, TAYLOR, of Virginia, and EDWARDS, of Connecticut, replied.

The bill was then passed, to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The bill, "supplementary to the several acts for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse districts, in the State of Louisiana," was again taken up for consideration. The question was upon a new bill, proposed as an amendment by Mr. LOWRIE, when the bill was before under consideration. Mr. L. stated the grounds of the bill. Messrs. CHANDLER, J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, and H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, made some remarks upon the subject. The amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended was passed, to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 2.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Thomas Johnson, formerly a purser in the Navy of the United States, praying for the appropriation of the proceeds of certain prizes taken by the United States squadron in the Mediterranean, in the year 1805. The report was read.

On motion, by Mr. ELLIOTT, the Message from the President of the United States, of yesterday, and the accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, to consider and report thereon; and they were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary to whom was referred the petition of A. V. Mattson, reported a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt,'" which was twice read, by unanimous consent.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to change the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States, in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the circuit court in Kentucky, reported it without amendment.

The bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to provide for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States was read the third time.

The bill "to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due by the purchasers of public lands," was again taken up for consideration. Some further amendments, in the details of this bill, were adopted, at the suggestion of Messrs. KING, of Alabama, and RUGGLES. The bill was then passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, as amended in Committee of the Whole; and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

The bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, "to change the terms of holding the circuit and district courts for the State of Ohio, and to change one of the terms of the circuit court for the State of Kentucky," was then taken up, in Committee of the Whole. Messrs. BROWN and TALBOT explained the objects of the bill. It was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill in addition to the act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States; and, on motion, it was postponed to Tuesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals;" and, on motion, it was postponed to Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill allowing a drawback on the exportation of cordage manufactured in the United States from foreign hemp; and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

On the third reading of the bill "providing for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States," Mr. NOBLE moved its recommitment to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to consider the expediency of extending the provisions of the bill to all claims not exceeding $10,000. Mr. N. supported his motion by some few remarks in favor of recommitment.

Mr. TALBOT also advocated the recommitment, on the ground that that part of the bill which limits its existence to three years, ought to be stricken out. He thought the operation of the act ought not to be limited, as it would always be in the power of Congress to repeal the law, if found to be inadequate to the purposes for which it was enacted. He proceeded to support the passage of some act, to take the cognizance of these claims from Congress, as a body totally unfit for such a duty; but he was opposed to the limitation of the act to a specified time.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, spoke in favor of retaining the present limitations of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, remarked upon the general course of claims against the Government, and stated his views of the manner of acting upon those claims. He was in favor of extending the amount of the claims to come under this act; but he thought the limitation of the act to three years ought to be retained, as it was to be considered in the light of an experiment.

Mr. VAN BUREN was well aware that the present mode of settling private claims against the Government, was extremely objectionable; that Congress was not a body calculated for a full and fair investigation of such claims; and another great objection to acting upon these claims here, is, that the decision upon them is never final. But yet he was opposed to the principle contained in the present bill, and therefore could not vote for it. He believed great injustice would result to the United States. He would be content to establish a Board of Commissioners, to sit at the City of Washington, for the purpose of deciding upon these claims—or he would be willing to establish a new department for this object, or to vest the decision in one of the present departments. Either of these plans, he thought, would be productive of good consequences. But the present bill would subject the United States to be impleaded in thirty or forty different circuit and district courts, in various parts of the country, and would involve great expense and trouble. All the claims against the Government, from its establishment to the present day, would be called up. All these claims had arisen from circumstances emanating from transactions in this city. The evidence respecting them was all here. If there were many claims of this kind to arise, the departments of the Government would find themselves continually engaged in defending cases in the courts of the different States. Certified copies of papers must be taken as evidence in these cases; and those copies must be prepared at the departments. The United States will not stand as good a chance to get justice done to it as the individual—the Government will scarcely ever get its rights. The courts and juries will always be biased in favor of the individual against the Government.

Mr. V. B. thought the bill would be productive of great inconvenience and difficulty. This mode of deciding claims, he believed, was without precedent in any country. No Government had ever consented to place itself upon such a footing. Mr. V. B. alluded to the petition of right in England, in order to show that it was not analogous to the provisions of this bill. It would be better, he thought, to provide that the United States should always be impleaded, in these cases, in the Supreme Court at Washington, because there the departments could have an eye upon the interests of the Government. But he had strong objections to spread them over the whole country. Obsolete claims, which have long since been decided against, and the decision acquiesced in, would again be brought up. Believing that these bad effects would result from the bill, he could not vote for it.

Mr. NOBLE modified his motion, so as to authorize the committee, if they should think proper, to report a bill for the establishment of some other tribunal for the adjustment of these claims.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, replied to the remarks made by Mr. VAN BUREN. He said this bill merely proposed to give to the circuit and district courts the power of acting on claims within their own districts. He believed that the establishment of a tribunal to try these claims at Washington, would be attended with many of the inconveniences that are now experienced from their being agitated in Congress. He thought that, so far from the evidence on claims such as were included in this act, being found at Washington, it was mostly to be obtained in the districts where the claimants live. He stated the difficulties which would attend the decision upon these claims by either of the departments. Our extent of territory would operate as an objection against the establishment of a tribunal, like the Court of Exchequer in England. Justice to individuals, Mr. T. said, required that their claims should be adjusted in their own districts, subject to certain restrictions and checks. He believed that, instead of the testimony required in the adjustment of these claims, always being found at the Seat of Government, as the gentleman from New York supposes, it would rarely ever be found there. We are constantly going to the districts where the claims originate, for this evidence—for certificates, private letters, and other documents. We are alarmed, too, by the hideous spectres of obsolete claims—we are told that obsolete claims, without number, will be conjured up. Mr. T. thought it extremely improbable that any claims more ancient or obsolete than some which had been brought before Congress, could be found; and if he had been about to put his finger on any one particular point, to demonstrate the necessity of adopting the provisions of this bill, he should have placed it upon the admission of these obsolete claims in Congress. He said, he believed there were acts of limitation to regulate these matters; if not, they could be made. Congress has the power to make laws of limitation; and he believed there would be no difficulty on this point.

Mr. T. believed that the objection, as to the increased labor of the judges, was equally inconsistent; if the labor of hearing the testimony was too great, for a large number of judges, spread through the country, how could the Heads of the Departments attend to it? This was a kind of duty for which the judges were appointed. Are your Departments competent to this duty, and your judges incompetent? He thought the argument inconclusive.

Mr. T. was in favor of extending the provisions of the bill to claims amounting to ten thousand dollars, and he was opposed to limiting the duration of the law. But he had been so deeply impressed with the necessity of some such system as this, which would get rid of what he considered a disreputable jurisdiction on the part of Congress; he was so perfectly satisfied of the necessity of some remedy for this evil; that he was willing to accommodate the bill to the ideas of other gentlemen on the subject. He believed that time and experience would sufficiently prove the utility of the measure.

Mr. CHANDLER objected to carrying these claims into the courts of the United States. He thought the juries who were called to try them, would invariably be biased in favor of the individual claimants, especially as the claimants would be their neighbors. These causes ought not to be tried in the different States, away from the Seat of Government, where alone the circumstances relating to the cases would be known. The district attorneys would not be likely to be acquainted with the merits of the cases. Mr. C. thought it would induce every man who thought he could put a fair face upon his claim, to bring it up for trial before a jury, who would be prejudiced against the Government; the claimant would have no expenses to pay; it would cost him nothing, but the payment of his own counsel. Mr. C. was willing that the bill should be recommit- ted, with instructions to report some other mode for the settlement of these claims.

Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, said he was happy at the prospect now presented, of obtaining some mode for the adjustment of private claims against the Government. Congress was certainly an incompetent body to try these claims. There was great impropriety in constituting so large a body of men, at so great an expense, to act on such subjects. The expense, upon small claims, was often greater than the amount of the claim. He thought it better that a board of commissioners should be created for this purpose—it would be better on account of the expenses to which the claimants would be subjected; their expenses would be much increased in a court of justice. The Government was bound, in his opinion, to establish some tribunal which would not increase the expense to those who held claims. The proofs, in these cases, would be, for the most part, in the hands of the Government. If other testimony were necessary, the commissioners would have power to issue commissions for taking depositions, &c. He objected to the submission of these claims to the courts of justice, as proposed by this bill, on account of the additional expenses that would be incurred by the claimants. He was, therefore, in favor of recommitting the bill.

Mr. VAN BUREN made some further remarks in explanation—to which Mr. TAYLOR replied.

Mr. VAN DYKE said it was manifest that the Senate and House of Representatives, from the manner in which they were constituted, were not calculated to act upon private claims—one great reason why they were not, was the want of time. It was absolutely impossible, with the great political subjects that were constantly presenting themselves to the consideration of Congress, that members could devote the requisite attention to the minute circumstances of every private claim that came before them. If there were sufficient time to obtain all this information, still, the mode adopted, and which was necessary to obtain it, rendered the determination very uncertain. Affidavits were taken, without any agent of the Government to attend to the business; the statements of individuals are received, in regard to their own accounts, the information which members are enabled to obtain, in relation to the claims, is relied upon for the want of any more authentic information. He felt grateful to the gentleman from Virginia, for his attention to this subject; and for submitting a plan to remedy the evils of the present system. Mr. VAN DYKE said he had paid considerable attention to this bill—he apprehended there would be no great difficulty in carrying it into effect—nothing like the difficulties with which the subject was at present embarrassed. If this plan was rejected, he should despair of any one being agreed upon hereafter. We had formerly had a commissioner for the settlement of claims, at the Seat of Government. The plan was found to be defective at the outset. The decisions were made by an individual, in some by-chamber. The best security for the citizen and for the Government, is in a decision in an open court of justice, where the judges, the jury, and the witnesses, are responsible before the public, for what they do and say. He did not wish to submit these claims to the decision of a commissioner, sitting in private. If we could not repose trust in our judges and jurors, under oath, then there was no security for the rights of property, and none for the permanence of our Government. He had no idea that the decision on these claims, under the provisions of this bill, would be as unfavorable to the Government, as their decision by Congress. In the present mode, there is no end to the claims. Their final settlement is one great object in carrying them into a court of justice. If these claims are rejected half a dozen times by Congress, they come up again, and are continued year after year, until at last, by some means or other, the case is made out, and Congress is induced to allow it. The members are worried out, and are glad to get rid of it. Mr. VAN DYKE said he was, therefore, determined to vote against sending the bill back to the committee. The whole evidence on each side, he said, could be taken in a court of justice, and he thought the plan well worth the experiment.

Mr. RUGGLES hoped the motion to recommit would prevail—and that the committee would see the necessity of providing for a board of commissioners, at the Seat of Government, to decide upon these claims. All these claims, for the settlement of which provision is to be made, will have been first rejected by the Treasury Department. There is scarcely a case of this kind, that comes before Congress, but for items of accounts that have been rejected at the Treasury. Suppose a person comes to ask that his claim may be allowed, is he bound to furnish evidence against himself? Mr. R. believed the most judicious mode would be to establish a board of commissioners, consisting of three persons—they should be under the direction of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury; and should sit in this city; where all the information on the subjects before them would be at hand. If they were at a distance from the Seat of Government, they would not be able to obtain this information so readily. The gentleman from Delaware has said, that we had some experience on the subject of appointing commissioners for this purpose—it was true we had—but the difficulties which affected that commission, might be remedied now. Such regulations might be adopted, as should be found necessary. By this mode, a uniform system, for the settlement of these claims, would be adopted, and known throughout the country. There would not be a rule for one place, and a different rule for another; as might be the case, if the decision was left to the courts. The gentleman from Maine has remarked upon the decisions of juries, in cases where the Government is concerned. There can be no doubt of the vigilance of the claimants, in prosecuting their own cases—and the bias would always be against the Government.

Mr. BELL said there were strong objections to the mode of acting upon these claims of the courts, both from the delay that would take place, and the expense to the claimants. The claims are first to be presented to the proper officers of the Government. If they are not allowed there they are to be carried into the court in the district where the claimant belongs. He must produce the same evidence in both cases. If the decision is against him, then he is to appeal to the Supreme Court. He must procure counsel in the courts, and will be subjected to enormous expenses. There is such a press of business in the courts that he would probably be compelled to wait some years before he would get a decision in the district court; and when he comes to the Supreme Court, he must wait several years longer. But if the plan of appointing commissioners is adopted; if the claim is disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, the same evidence may be produced before the commissioners, and the claim decided on the spot, without expense to the claimant. He had not a doubt that this would be the best plan, both as regards the interest of the Government, and that of the individual claimant. He should have more confidence in the decisions of commissioners than in that of a jury, to whom the claimant would be known, and who might be prejudiced in his favor. He was, therefore, in favor of a recommitment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, said he only rose to request gentlemen to recollect that not a single case, under this bill, was to be decided by a jury; they were only to be empanelled, under certain circumstances, to judge of certain facts in the case.

The question was then put and carried in favor of recommitment.

NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the House of Representatives “making appropriations for the support of the Navy, for the year 1824,” with amendments. On the motion of Mr. LLOYD, the bill was then taken into consideration, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH in the Chair.

The first amendment proposed by the Committee is to strike out all of the specifications of the various items of the contingent expenses in the Navy Department, and insert them in gross. It proposes, also, to raise the amount of that appropriation from $180,000 to $225,000. Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, stated, that the object of this amendment was, in the first place, to restore the bill to the same form that had always been adopted in the bills making similar appropriations—the contingent expenses of the Department having always been put down in gross. He said that $225,000 was the sum originally reported in the House, for this item—and that it was the least possible amount with which the business of the Department could be conducted. This amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment provides for the purchase of a strip of land in the vicinity of the navy yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts. Mr. LLOYD stated that this strip of land was required to build a wall for the preservation of public property. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment is to strike out "20,000," as the amount "for ordnance, ordnance stores, small arms, and the manufacture of powder," and insert, in lieu thereof, the sum of $1,000, together with the unexpended balance of the last year's appropriation for this object. This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOWRIE made an inquiry as to the estimates for the price of rations—which was answered by Mr. LLOYD and Mr. PARROTT.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, as amended—the several amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed—and the bill passed to a third reading.

The amendments were subsequently reported as being duly engrossed; and, on Mr. LLOYD's motion, the bill was read the third time, passed, and sent to the other House, for concurrence in the amendments.

MONDAY, April 5.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of Pennsylvania, transmitting a resolution of the General Assembly of that State, approving the declaration of the President of the United States in favor of the cause of liberty in the Western Hemisphere. The letter and resolution were read, and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from A. B. Woodward, enclosing a memorial proposing a standard of measure for the United States; which was read, and the letter and memorial were referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. MCILVAINE presented the memorial of Thomas Beesley and others, of Cape May county, in New Jersey; and of Lewis M. Walker and others; severally praying an increase of the duties on imported iron. The memorials were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. HAYNE presented the memorial of William D. Martin, in behalf of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Luke, in South Carolina, remonstrating against the passage of the bill pending in Congress, to increase the duties on imports; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands, was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the petition of Thomas Johnston, and it was laid on the table.

The bill to change the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the circuit court in Kentucky, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, "supplementary to the several acts for the release of persons imprisoned at the suit of the United States," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole, Mr. RUGGLES in the Chair.

This bill provides for the relief of A. B. Matson, an insolvent debtor, imprisoned in the State of Pennsylvania, who is prevented from taking the oath necessary to his release by the absence of the district attorney for that district. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1824;" they concur in the second of the said amendments, with an amendment; and they concur in the third of said amendments. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of tax;" in which amendment and bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," was then again taken up for consideration. Some further amendments were made in the details of the bill, at the suggestion of Mr. MILLS. Upon one of these amendments, which provides that the creditor shall have a right to hold his debtor to bail, without proof of fraud, when he is about to leave the State in which the debt is contracted, some cursory discussion took place between Messrs. VAN BUREN, MILLS, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, HAYNE, HOLMES, of Maine, TALBOT, and CHANDLER. It was then agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR proposed a proviso, that no person should be required to give bail, except in the State in which he resides. Mr. MILLS and Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, opposed this amendment, and Messrs. BARBOUR and SMITH supported it. It was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN BUREN proposed some amendments, which were adopted.

Mr. TALBOT proposed to amend the bill, by providing that no debtor shall be held to bail, except in the State where he resides, or the State in which the debt was contracted.

This provision was supported by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, (who called for the yeas and nays,) and by Messrs. TALBOT, and TAYLOR, of Virginia, and opposed by Mr. MILLS.

Mr. TALBOT then modified his amendment, by adding the words "unless the defendant shall have absconded from the State in which he resides, in order to evade the payment of his debts."

This amendment was carried—ayes 28, noes 11, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Benton, Branch, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, J. S. Johnston, King of Alabama, Knight, King of New York, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Van Buren, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Gaillard, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Mills, Noble, Van Dyke, and Ware.

Mr. CHANDLER moved an amendment to exempt the debtors to the United States from the provisions of the bill. This was not agreed to.

The amendment proposed by Mr. VAN DYKE, when the bill was before under consideration, to authorize the creditor to put interrogatories, and to make suggestions in relation to the case, and, if they are not satisfactorily answered by the defendant, the charges therein contained to be taken as facts, was then taken up.

Mr. VAN DYKE offered a few remarks in support of this proposition; it was also supported by Mr. VAN BUREN, and opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and TALBOT, and was then adopted by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, proposed a new section to the bill, extending its operation to the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

Mr. VAN DYKE submitted a proviso, "that nothing, in the first section of this act contained, shall extend to suits in which the United States are a party." Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this amendment. Some remarks were made upon it by Messrs. VAN DYKE, HAYNE, NOBLE, BARBOUR, JOHNSON of Kentucky, and MACON. Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, moved to amend the amendment by adding to it the words, "against any contractor, or receiver or disbursing of public moneys." Mr. HOLMES, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, advocated this amendment, and Mr. VAN DYKE opposed it. These amendments were both withdrawn, and a substitute proposed by Mr. VAN DYKE, as follows: "that nothing in the first section of this bill shall extend to any suit brought to recover moneys received by the defendant, on account of the United States." This was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be printed, as amended; and, without taking the question on its third reading, the Senate adjourned till tomorrow.

TUESDAY, April 6.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Alexander McNair, praying compensation for services rendered as a paymaster; reimbursement of interest paid by him on money for the use of Government; remuneration for the loss of a house destroyed by fire, whilst occupied by the United States troops, during the late war; and an equitable settlement of his accounts. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FINDLAY presented the petition of Henry Miller, praying to be compensated for military services rendered during the Revolutionary war; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of tax," was twice read, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Barbara Paulas," reported it without amendment.

The bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt,'" was read the third time, and passed.

NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

The bill "making appropriations for the naval service of the United States, for the year 1824," was again taken up for the purpose of considering the amendments made thereto in the Senate, and which were not concurred in by the House.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, moved that the Senate should concur in the amendment proposed by the House, requiring the consent of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to the purchase of a strip of land adjacent to the navy yard at Charlestown, in that State. This motion was carried.

Mr. LLOYD then moved that the Senate should insist upon its amendment, by which the several specifications of the contingent expenses of the Navy Department, as contained in the bill that came from the House, were stricken out, and the sum inserted in gross; and by which, also, the same item was increased from $180,000 to $225,000. After some remarks on this subject by Messrs. LLOYD, LOWRIE, BARBOUR, and SMITH, the motion prevailed, and the Senate determined to insist upon this amendment.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The unfinished business of yesterday being the bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," was resumed; Mr. RUGGLES in the chair. The question was, upon passing the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. HAYNE said, that it was impossible to listen with indifference to the eloquent appeals which had been made to the feelings of the Senate, by the honorable gentlemen from Kentucky and Virginia, (Mr. R. M. JOHNSON and Mr. BARBOUR,) appeals which must always have a powerful influence, when they came recommended by the virtues of those by whom they were urged. The pictures of distress which the gentlemen had drawn, could not fail to command our sympathy, and, if the decision of the question depended on feeling merely, that decision would be easily made. But, said Mr. H., I consider this a grave and sober question of judicial policy, in the discussion of which it will be necessary to look to established principles and usages, and which can only be wisely decided by a careful examination of the tendency and probable effect of the measure proposed. This measure is entitled "A bill to abolish imprisonment for debt," and those who shall not look beyond the title, will, of course, conclude that it proposes to "open the prison doors" throughout the whole extent of this great Republic; and that "the voice of the oppressor" is to be no more heard in our land. Such, however, is by no means its true character. The operation of the bill is to be confined, exclusively, to the courts of the United States; its provisions will apply to a very inconsiderable number of the debtors, scattered through the country; and the remedy provided, is one which will afford no substantial relief to the distresses of the unfortunate. The manner in which the question had been discussed, had brought to his mind a truth, (confirmed by the whole course of his reading and experience,) that much of the difference of opinion which exists in the world, arises from the want of agreement as to the meaning of terms or of propositions. The gentleman from Virginia states his proposition in these words: "Is it right to punish, by imprisonment, the honest but insolvent debtor?" And, to this question, all his observations had been strictly confined. I have no hesitation, said Mr. H., in giving my full assent to all the arguments of that gentleman; with him, I answer the question in the negative; and, in that answer, I am confident every member of the Senate will concur. Indeed, it may be doubted whether creditors themselves (hard-hearted as they are all supposed to be) would hesitate a moment in consenting to the release of debtors whose honesty and insolvency should be ascertained. A solitary "monster in human shape" may occasionally be found, who would "feast upon the groans and tears of the wretched;" but, for the honor of humanity, such cases are so rare, that we may safely affirm that creditors, as a class, would as zealously contend against the punishment, by imprisonment, of the honest and insolvent debtor, as the gentleman from Virginia himself. The professed object of this bill, said Mr. H., is, to abolish, entirely, legal process against the person of the debtor; to discard what are commonly called bail writs, and executions against the body; and gentlemen argue as if these writs were devised and intended merely as a punishment of what they are pleased to call "the crimes of being in debt and being unfortunate." Now, these writs, said Mr. H., are merely the means provided by the law to compel debtors to pay their just debts; they are the remedies by which a creditor is enabled to enforce his rights. They were intended to apply, not to the honest and unfortunate, but to the dishonest and the solvent; and, if the remedies intended for the latter are occasionally applied to the former, it is only because it is found impossible, in some cases, to distinguish between them, and because human affairs can only be regulated by a system of general rules. Whatever may be said of the origin of the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, or the theory on which it rests, it is certain that in modern times, and certainly in the happy land in which our lot has been cast, that process is, in practice, nothing more than the means of compelling a debtor to pay his debts—a debtor who, having the ability, is unwilling to comply with his obligations. We have heard of a question being agitated in other countries, as to the right of a creditor to the body of his debtor, and of a formal negotiation, by the family of a deceased debtor, for the purchase of the corpse, in order to honor it by the rites of a "Christian burial." But, who ever heard of such a question being made in America? What lawyer can doubt that our courts would hold such claims, on the part of a creditor, as contrary to humanity and common decency; as inconsistent with our institutions, and, therefore, against the law of the land? It is true, we have lately been shocked by an idle and shameful report of the arrest of a dead body, in one of the most moral, enlightened, and polished cities of this Union; but that report is known to be a mere fabrication. There never yet has been, and there never can be, said Mr. H., claims of such a nature set up in this country. If the gentlemen on the other side, however, seriously believe that evils may hereafter arise from the theory of the common law; that the body of a citizen may be taken "in satisfaction of a debt," and they will confine their remedies to the destruction of that theory merely; if they feel disposed to make the process against the body, in law, what it is now, in fact, a mere remedial process for the enforcement of debts, I shall not, said Mr. H., be disposed to object.

Imprisonment for debt (or as the gentlemen express it, "as a penalty for debt") is almost unknown in the United States; there is not a State in the Union which has not provided by law for the release of debtors from imprisonment; and in respect to the courts of the United States, a similar provision has been made. It is true, that the regulations on this subject are incomplete and in some respects oppressive, and it is certainly very desirable that some mild and efficacious system should be provided, to be uniform throughout the United States, which, protecting alike the just rights of creditors and debtors, should be consistent with the claims of justice and humanity. It is sufficient, however, said Mr. H., for my present purpose, to say that the existing laws do substantially provide (and if they do not I am willing that they shall be so amended as to provide) that a debtor shall only be imprisoned for the purpose of compelling him to surrender his property. If the theory that the body of a debtor may be taken "in satisfaction of a debt" has not already been, I am willing that it shall be, exploded, as inconsistent with the refined sentiments, and the moral sense of the enlightened age in which we live.

As the gentleman and myself agree thus far in principle, it may be well to ascertain, before I proceed further, in what we differ, as well as the nature and extent of that difference. The gentlemen propose to abolish all process against the body of the debtor, and to keep his person free from arrest until fraud shall be established. According to this plan, they propose that bail writs shall not be used except where a debtor is known to be about to abscond; and that executions against the body shall be confined to cases of fraud and concealment first legally proved. I contend, on the contrary, that these writs are remedies essential to creditors, who ought to be permitted to use them as means, though as means only, for the purpose of attaining the end, viz., the satisfaction in money of their just demands. The gentleman would not permit the body to be touched at all till fraud be proved, whilst the law, on the contrary, authorizes the arrest and detention of the person until the debt be paid or the property of the debtor be given up. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky has in limine laid down a position from which I am compelled to dissent. He denies the right of society to deprive a man of his liberty even for an hour, except it be as a punishment for a crime, and from this position he draws the conclusion that, as debt is not a crime, society has no right to imprison a man on account of a debt. Now, said Mr. H., I submit that the gentleman has mistaken the source from whence the right to deprive a citizen of his liberty or property is derived. Penalties are never imposed merely as a punishment to the criminal, it is reserved to the great Creator to apportion, by an unerring standard, the just measure of punishment for crimes of every grade. But society imposes penalties for the sake of example, and in order to promote the welfare of mankind. The right being derived from this source, it follows that it is only limited by the demands of justice and expediency. Whatever the general welfare of the community imperiously demands, must be done; and, if the safety and happiness of society should require the exercise of restraints in certain cases on personal liberty, such restraints become lawful. I admit, said Mr. H., that this is a right which society is bound to exercise with great caution, and with a due regard to the value of liberty. But the very elements of society would be destroyed, and all social order subverted, if this right did not exist. If it were true that the criminal only could be lawfully imprisoned, how does society derive the right to deprive a man of his liberty who is merely accused of a crime, and who (according to the humane principles of our law) is presumed to be innocent? In every country on earth a witness essential to a prosecution, if he cannot give security to appear, is put into prison until his testimony is given in open court; and Mr. H., would ask the gentleman by what right that was done? Mr. H. recollected a very strong case of this kind. In the city in which he resides, a murder was committed in the presence of an English sailor; and without his testimony the perpetrator of the crime could not be brought to justice. He gave information to a magistrate, but at the same time declared that he could not wait to testify in court, as he had a family at home who depended on his daily labor for support. The magistrate was compelled to commit the witness (most surely an innocent and meritorious man) to the common jail, where he remained for several months; and by this harsh, though necessary proceeding, a murderer was brought to justice. The right of society to deprive this innocent man of his liberty was derived from their obligation to provide for the welfare of the community. From the same source is derived the right to imprison men accused of crimes, (though many of them must of necessity be innocent,) and of imprisoning debtors, many of whom are also innocent, until, by a proper investigation, their true character can be made to appear. The right, therefore, in all such cases, depends on the necessity of the measure, and I admit that such a right cannot be claimed, and ought not to be exercised, except in subserviency to the great interests of the society.

It is manifest, therefore, that the propriety of abolishing the legal process against the body of debtors depends altogether on the utility of that process. If it be the necessary and only appropriate means for the collection of debts—if its abolition would destroy the rights and render nugatory the remedies of creditors—if the obligation of contracts would thereby be impaired, it would follow that such process ought not to be dispensed with. Such a measure would seriously affect the welfare of the community, by destroying credit and impairing those habits of industry and probity on which that welfare must depend. But the gentleman from Virginia asks, emphatically, “whether we would punish by imprisonment the honest, but unfortunate and insolvent debtor?” I answer, by putting another question, “would he exempt from imprisonment the solvent and dishonest debtor?” The whole difficulty, said Mr. H., arises from the imperfection of all human institutions. It belongs only to the great Creator to survey, at a glance, the complicated transactions of men—to know their actual condition—to look into their hearts—to scan their motives; and to determine, with unerring wisdom, the true situation and character of every individual of the great human family. But frail, short-sighted mortals are compelled to judge from appearances; they must be satisfied with circumstantial testimony, and can only approximate the truth by laborious and careful investigations. Hence, it becomes absolutely necessary to provide general rules for the regulation of human affairs, and by those rules we are compelled to abide, though we must be aware that injustice may occasionally result from their operation.

I will endeavor, said Mr. HAYNE, in the examination of this subject, to prove that it is inexpedient and unjust to abolish the process against the body, limited and restrained, as I admit such process ought to be, to the single object of compelling a debtor to pay his debts or to surrender his estate. When a debt is established by a judicial decision, the creditor, it will be admitted, is entitled to payment, and indeed the judgment of the court, in all such cases, is, that the debtor shall be compelled to pay. But by what means is such a judgment to be enforced? If property was always visible and tangible there would exist no difficulty. Lands could be seized and sold, and the debt be thus satisfied. But, in modern times, a large portion of the wealth of society consists of stock, of bonds, notes, bills, exchange, and of that species of property called choses in action, which are not liable to be sold under an execution. Some idea may be formed of the immense quantity of this species of personal property, by reflecting on the amount of public stock alone, which exists at this day in the principal nations of Christian Europe. Great Britain has issued stock, which is held by individuals to the amount of eight hundred millions of pounds sterling; France to the amount of upwards of one hundred and eighty millions; Holland one hundred and fifty millions, and Spain one hundred and thirty millions. The United States has issued upwards of twenty millions sterling, which remains unredeemed.

Now, sir, when we add to this the immense amount of bank and insurance stocks—the stock of incorporated companies—the astonishing amount of bills, bonds, notes, and debts, (which, in every country, form such a large proportion of its commercial capital,) when, in short, we find that there is scarcely a particle of visible property, which is not represented by an equal amount of invisible property, and that the former is at all times convertible into the latter, is it not manifest that any system for the collection of debts must be wholly inadequate, which shall not provide efficient means for compelling debtors to apply the whole of their personal property to the discharge of their debts? The law provides two remedies, both admirably adapted to this object. The first is an execution against the goods, (a fieri facias), by which the visible and tangible property may be seized and sold; the second, an execution against the body, (a capias ad satisfaciendum), by which the debtor may be imprisoned until he shall apply his personal estate to the discharge of his debts. Now, if the latter process should be abolished, it is obvious that creditors will be left entirely at the mercy of their debtors. The extent of the evil which this system would introduce may be understood, when it is considered, that the great mass of debtors are those whose estates consist of that species of personal property on which no levy can be made. The land-holders compose but a small portion of the great class of debtors; it is the capitalist, the trader, the holder of stock and choses in action, who engages most largely in those speculations which produce debts. To exempt their property from liability, would be to give a vital stab to commercial credit and prosperity.

I will be told, however, said Mr. H., that the bill before us contains a provision by which an execution against the body may be issued, when it shall be ascertained, by a judicial investigation, that a debtor has property not liable to seizure; and this brings me, said Mr. H., to an examination of the particular provisions of this bill.

The fourth section of the bill provides, that on a judgment or decree being obtained either at law or in equity, a fi fieri facias, or other process, against the property, may be taken out, but the creditor is deprived of the privilege of issuing any process against the body. Now, by the practical operation of this provision, a wide distinction is made between real and personal estate—I mean that species of personal estate which is not tangible, and which (by the laws of England, as well as most of the States of this Union,) is not liable to be levied on and sold under an execution. According to this provision of the bill, a judgment may be enforced by the sale of land the moment it is obtained; but, as personal property cannot be levied on, the owner of such property is on a better footing than the owner of land.

Let us look, said Mr. H., a little closer into this fourth section. It provides that when a judgment is obtained, if the debtor's estate shall consist of personal property, which cannot be levied on, the creditor shall be obliged to file a suggestion on oath, setting forth that the debtor keeps his property so invested; on which suggestion he is entitled to take out a new writ, here called a "writ of discovery," but which is to be nothing more than a process commanding the debtor to appear at the next court, (to meet perhaps six months or a year afterwards,) and to answer the charge. What charge? Why, that the estate of the debtor consists of personal property. If the debtor should give security to appear to this writ of discovery, and should actually appear at the next court, then an issue is to be made up to try the fact, viz: whether his estate be invested in personal property or not. This issue may or may not be connected with the charge of fraud, and in either case it is, to all intents and purposes, a new suit, subject to all the expense and delay of the original proceeding. In obtaining a judgment, the wise jealousy of the law requires the observance of certain forms, which necessarily creates delay, and thus it is often the business of years to obtain a judgment. Yet by this bill, if the debtor's estate consists of personal, instead of real property, a second suit is to be commenced, as tedious and expensive as the first; and thus a most unwise distinction is made between real and personal estate, and the grossest injustice is done to creditors.

But, said Mr. H., I will further undertake to prove, that, according to the provisions of this bill, debtors who possess personal property cannot be compelled to pay their debts at all, provided two or more of them combine, for the purpose of putting their creditors at defiance. I have purposely delayed my remarks, said Mr. H., until all the amendments proposed to the bill had been disposed of, so that I must now take it for granted, that the friends of the bill have moulded it to their wishes, and given it the form in which they intend that it shall pass. Now, I will demonstrate, that, in the case of two debtors, the one possessed of real, and the other of personal estate—the former can be compelled to pay as soon as a judgment is obtained, while the latter may put his creditors forever at defiance. A is the owner of real estate—a judgment is obtained against him—a fi fieri facias is taken out—his lands are seized and sold, and the debt is immediately collected. B is the owner of stock or bonds, (to the amount, if you please, of $100,000;) property not concealed, but the possession of which he openly acknowledges. Judgment is obtained against B, but how is it to be enforced, the stock and bonds not being liable to an execution, and the body being exempt from arrest? Why, according to this bill, a "writ of discovery" is taken out. To this writ, B is to give bail, and when, in the regular and tedious course of legal proceedings, the issue made up on that writ is called for trial, B may fail to appear; and what is to be the consequence? Does his person thereby become liable to arrest? No. But strange indeed! by reason of his default, his estate, as well as his person, become entirely and forever exonerated from all further liability; the creditor loses his remedy against B, and acquires only a right of action against C, the bail of B. The creditor now having passed through the ordeal of two suits at law, and encountered all the vexation and expense incident to legal proceedings, finds himself precisely in the situation in which he was before he commenced those proceedings. He has acquired nothing more than a right of action against the bail of B. But, unfortunately, the same forms are to be observed in his proceedings against C. His person and his personal estate are, in like manner, free from arrest; and, after resorting to actions, affidavits, writs of discovery, issues, and so forth, the unfortunate creditor may recover nothing more than another right of action against D, the bail of C; and so on ad infinitum. Thus is one debt to be discharged by another; one right of action to be satisfied by another right of action; and the creditor who unfortunately resorts to a law suit to recover a debt, is to be paid by another law suit. I humbly conceive, said Mr. H., that this will be the most unsubstantial mode of payment that ever was devised. A creditor would be better off who should be compelled to receive in payment the wretched trash which exists in some part of the country, and is dignified by the name of "paper money." It would be better to receive the "bills of credit" issued during the war of the Revolution; for, at the period of their lowest depreciation, $1,000 could procure a bushel of salt.

But, said Mr. H., if this clause of the bill were not liable to be thus evaded, I should still object to it, on the ground that it renders a second suit necessary, before personal property can be touched; because it thus makes a most injurious and unjust distinction between real and personal estate; and because it opens a wide door to fraud, by permitting and tempting debtors, while a suit is pending, to change their property from real to personal. Now, said Mr. H., the principle on which this bill is founded, is radically unsound. Your remedies ought to be directed to the speedy release of the debtor, after arrest, and not to the destruction of the process of the law. Your remedies should be more extensive, and more effectual, than that provided by this bill, and should really and truly yield that relief to the honest and unfortunate debtor, which this bill promises, but does not afford.

As you cannot, without previous investigation, ascertain whether a debtor is unable, or only unwilling, to pay; and, as there are no means of touching a large portion of the personal estate of modern times, by any legal process whatever, it appears to my mind, said Mr. H., neither unreasonable nor unjust, to require of a debtor, before his person shall be released from the claims of his creditor, to render, on oath, a schedule of his property, and to make an assignment thereof, for the benefit of his creditors. If a debtor will not do this, he ought to be imprisoned. Nor is it an extravagant presumption, nor one which ought not to be, prima facie, indulged, that a man who contracts a debt, is able to pay. It seems to follow that he ought not to be released until his inability is made to appear; or, at least, until he makes a disclosure, on oath, and a surrender of his property. Should he possess no property, a declaration on oath, to that effect, ought to be deemed sufficient, provided suitable penalties were imposed on taking a false oath in such cases.

The gentlemen on the other side have, at every stage of this discussion, recurred to the situation of the "unfortunate debtor." They have made the most touching and passionate appeals to our feelings, and in the spirit of the author of the "Sentimental Journey," have taken "a single captive, and having first shut him up in his dungeon, have looked through the twilight of his grated door, to take his picture"—a picture to which they have added deeper shades, by the introduction of his lovely wife and innocent children, sharing in his captivity. Sir, said Mr. H., I have not listened to these appeals without emotion. It is, indeed, impossible to behold with coldness or indifference the manly bosom of my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. R. M. JOHNSON,) that bosom which has been bared to the swords of the enemies of his country, and been stained with patriotic blood, now "overflowing with the milk of human kindness." And it is with kindred emotions I have found the lofty sentiments and generous feelings of the honorable gentleman from Virginia enlisted in the cause of suffering humanity. I know—indeed, sir, I feel most sensibly—that my friends have the popular side of this question. To them all the fields of eloquence are open, and they have not failed to cull the choicest flowers.

I know, sir, that the sympathies of the people have been excited in behalf of debtors. But, though I am not disposed to object to the indulgence of such sympathies, I would remark that they certainly ought to be chastened and qualified by the consideration that, whenever a debtor is protected in his refusal to pay his debts, he is left in possession of the property of another. How are debts in general contracted? A man borrows money, purchases property, or obtains the personal services of another, for which he becomes not only legally, but morally, bound to pay. It is true he may be overtaken by misfortune; he may be touched by the hand of the Almighty; the very elements may conspire against him; and, by these means, his inability to comply with his contracts may be produced. But, in how many instances do debtors go on in a course of heedless conduct, and extravagant living, and, with their eyes open, waste the property of another, well knowing that when the day of payment shall arrive, they will be found wanting. In the dark catalogue of human woes, Mr. H. said, he would venture to assert that a large portion of misery presented to our view, would be found to result from the fraudulent conduct of debtors. The refusal of debtors to pay their just debts—the fraudulent concealment, or careless dissipation of their effects, had brought innumerable creditors to ruin and despair. Many a father of a family had been thus reduced to poverty, and found himself unable to supply his wife and children with the necessities of life. Many a widow has been brought to abject penury. Many an orphan had been robbed of the “food convenient” both for the body and the mind. But such cases excite no commiseration—theirs are unobtrusive sorrows.

On the ground merely of feeling and sympathy, (putting justice and expediency out of the question,) Mr. H. was therefore disposed to doubt, whether debtors, as a class, were more entitled to sympathy and protection than creditors. But, said Mr. H., on principles of enlarged philanthropy, and of public policy, he was fully convinced that the welfare of mankind did require that an honest and insolvent debtor should be relieved, not only from continued imprisonment, but, under certain circumstances, even from future liability. By whatever means (except fraud) a man may have become actually insolvent, the interests of society seemed to demand that his future exertions should not be wholly lost. A man worn down by the accumulated weight of debts which he can never hope to satisfy, left subject to the daily assaults of creditors, all struggling to extort the last farthing of his daily earnings, must be borne down to the earth by the calamities of his situation, and will be found incapable of becoming a useful or honorable member of society. Such a man, being deprived of the stimulus of hope, and left wholly under the influence of his fears, will have his exertions paralyzed, and his bosom will be the seat of hopeless despair. I would be disposed, said Mr. H., to relieve such a man—to rescue him from his abject condition, and make him useful, if not happy. I would make him free, give a new impulse to his industry, and, without doing any essential injury to creditors, render an immense service to the community. But here the gentlemen sound the alarm, that I am advocating a bankrupt law. Names, said Mr. H., are not things. Call it what you may, the system I am disposed to advocate is this: I would subject the person of a debtor to arrest, under an execution against the body—not as a punishment—not in satisfaction of the debt—but as the only effectual means of obtaining from him his property. But as soon as this object was accomplished, that is to say, the moment a surrender of his property to his creditor was made, or a declaration on oath was given that he possessed no property, I would release his person from imprisonment, subject only to the penalties which might follow the conviction of having taken a false oath. So far my plan embraces the principles only of an insolvent law. But, said Mr. H., I would be disposed to go one step further, and provide, that a debtor who had not wasted his substance, but who, as soon as he had discovered his situation, and became sensible of his failing circumstances, had come forward, and rendered equal justice to all of his creditors, by the full and free surrender of the remnant of his estate, should be released from further liability. In other words, said Mr. H., I would provide a mild and judicious bankrupt law, so qualified and guarded as to prevent fraud, avoid all oppression, secure the just rights of creditors, and extend effectual relief to all honest debtors. I would have a system so modified, as to embrace within its provisions every class in the community, and to extend to each that relief most appropriate to their respective situations—a system of bankruptcy which might be made compulsory on traders in certain situations, and might be voluntarily embraced by all others.

Now, I will freely acknowledge, said Mr. H., that my strongest objection to this bill arises from its total inefficacy, and its being calculated to postpone, and perhaps prevent the adoption of the only effectual and adequate remedy—a mild and uniform system of bankruptcy. Sir, said Mr. H., gentlemen have submitted some appalling statements of the number of insolvent debtors who have been imprisoned in the United States. They have stated that, in one of our commercial cities, there has been, on an average, upwards of one thousand persons imprisoned for debt in a year, and they calculate that between fifteen and twenty thousand debtors have been annually imprisoned in the United States. Now, taking these statements to be correct, they seem to prove, conclusively, that this bill ought not to pass. It is not the proper remedy, because it is not co-extensive with the evil. In the city alluded to, in which it is stated that a thousand debtors have been imprisoned in a year, it has been proved, by documents produced before the Senate, that only a solitary individual was confined under a process issued from the United States courts, and by the same ratio fifteen or twenty persons only could have been so imprisoned out of the twenty thousand debtors. Of these twenty, a majority were probably confined on debts due to the Government, to which the provisions of this bill were not intended to apply—so that of this immense mass of debtors, (all of whom the gentlemen consider to be honest and insolvent,) ten or twelve only could obtain relief from this bill, and the whole of the remainder would be left to suffer, under all the evils which the gentlemen have so forcibly depicted.

Now, said Mr. H., if the accounts we have had be not greatly exaggerated—if these persons be entitled to relief—it is our solemn duty to provide an effectual relief. But, to pass this bill, confined as it is entirely to the courts of the United States—and even in those courts limited to a particular class of debtors—and to call this “abolishing imprisonment for debt,” is little else than solemn mockery. The people are asking for bread, and we give them a stone.

Sir, said Mr. H. we have had numerous petitions praying for an uniform bankrupt or insolvent law: we have not had one, asking for the relief the bill proposes to extend. The Constitution has given to us, for wise and humane purposes, the power of providing a uniform system of relief to all honest debtors; a system to pervade the whole country—to embrace all classes and conditions of men—to apply to all of the courts, as well of the States as of the Union; and, instead of acting paternally on this great authority, for the maintenance of credit, the relief of distress, and the establishment of justice, we are about to do—what? Why, to adopt a wretched system of temporary, partial, and ineffectual relief to a few solitary cases; cases picked out of the mass of unfortunate debtors—and we are about to do this, by means calculated to destroy credit, favor fraud, and impair the character of our courts and of the people. For such a system, (call it by what popular name you please,) he would never give his vote.

But we are told, said Mr. H., that a bankrupt law, however just and necessary, cannot pass. This, Mr. H. was convinced, was a mistake. It may be true, that such a system as that of England, or such a plan as that introduced into the House of Representatives last year, may not pass, and Mr. H. was not prepared to advocate either of them. But, that a mild and judicious, though effectual system would meet the approbation of the Senate, distinctly appears from the declarations of the gentlemen, made in debate on this floor. Mr. H. was willing to adopt the sentiments of Lord Coke, which the gentleman from Virginia had quoted with approbation, "that, although measures, right in themselves, often failed in the beginning, they invariably prevailed in the end." Mr. H. said there was one view of the subject which made it his duty earnestly to press this matter on the consideration of the House. Hitherto, every State in the Union had provided some system of insolvency, by which debtors were released from imprisonment, and the rights of creditors were intended to be protected. These laws were, it is true, very contradictory and various, and certainly were not, in general, founded on the wisest and most judicious principle. But, in the absence of a uniform system of bankruptcy, these laws were essential for the prevention of the greatest injustice, and the most extensive and accumulated misery. But, the Supreme Court of the United States had, in the case of Sturges and Crowninshield, made a decision, the effect of which, it was supposed, would be to render void the State insolvent laws, and thus the mass of debtors throughout the Union will be thrown upon the United States, from whom alone they can obtain relief. They are every where, said Mr. H., looking up to us for relief. Can we, under these circumstances, refuse to exercise a power pressed upon us by so many and such powerful considerations? He hoped not. But, said Mr. H., if gentlemen cannot or will not provide this effectual remedy, he would ask, where is the necessity of passing this bill? Why should the processes in the courts of the United States be rendered different from those which prevail in the States respectively? The laws of the States were, in general, and ought to be, the laws of the courts of the United States. He thought that it would be wise that each State should be left to regulate the mesne as well as final process to which its citizens should be subjected. In regulating the courts of the United States by a rule different from that which prevails in the courts of the respective States, evils may be introduced, of the extent of which no gentleman here can be fully aware. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, before alluded to, calls upon us, with the imperative voice of duty, justice, and humanity, to exert our power to remedy these evils. But where is the necessity of regulating the process in the courts of the United States? Make them, in all cases, similar to those used in the State courts, and then each State will be able to use, or not to use, the bail writs, and executions against the body, as the convenience and welfare of their own citizens may require.

There is another view of this subject, entitled to some weight. In one or more of the States, it appears (from the statements of gentlemen) that land cannot be sold under execution, except for two-thirds of its appraised value; and we are gravely told that, under existing circumstances, it never brings that amount. Then, it follows, that, under this bill, the owner of real estate, in some parts of the Union, is to be wholly exonerated from his debts. If you could take his body, you might, by that means compel him to sell his lands, and pay his debts. But here, as his lands cannot be sold, and his body cannot be taken, he may live in splendor while his creditor (from whom, perhaps, he procured the very property he retains) is starving.

On the first section of this bill, which confines bail writs to certain specified cases, Mr. H. said he was not disposed to enter into any argument. If the views he had endeavored to inculcate were in any degree correct, it would follow that bail writs ought not to be abolished, but some provision should be made by which a debtor should be permitted either to give bail, or be entitled to his discharge on the surrender of his property. Mr. H. believed that bail writs not unfrequently enabled creditors to arrest their debtors in a course of heedless extravagance, and by these means to secure a portion of their debts; but he feared that, under this bill, creditors might behold the substance of their debtors wasting away during the years which are often consumed in a law suit, with the very comfortable prospect of obtaining, in the end, a judgment which could be levied neither on the person nor the property of the debtor, and which could not be rendered operative until every particle of property had been dissipated.

I confess, said Mr. H., I have strong objections to all the provisions of this bill, which relate to the Government; and which create what appeared to his mind to be a very unjust distinction between the Government and individuals. Apprehending that some of the provisions of the bill might operate injuriously on suitors, you exempt the United States from them. The body of a debtor may be taken by a capias, at the suit of the United States, but not at the suit of a citizen. Now, if on principle, and as a matter of justice, and of right, "every debtor must be considered honest and insolvent, until the contrary shall be proved,"—if, as gentlemen insist, "society has no right to imprison such a man," how do gentlemen reconcile this exception with their own principles? And if the apprehension of loss and injury to the Government, makes it necessary or prudent to except from the operation of the bill the suits brought by the United States, ought not the same principle to extend to suits brought by individuals? Can you, with any show of justice or consistency, refuse to extend a humane, wise, and safe rule to all suits whatsoever, and if the rule be unsafe, can you in honor and conscience make it obligatory on individuals? Can you with justice apply one rule to your own suits, and a different one to the suits of others? Sir, said Mr. H., the citizens of this country have a right to demand at your hands that you should make no unjust or injurious distinctions, and if you open your courts to them all, you are bound to apply to them the same rules, and afford them the same remedies, that are used by the Government. It is an odious practice, one borrowed from the monarchies of Europe, that Governments, when they go into a court of justice, should be placed on a better footing than individuals. It is a principle that is calculated to shake the confidence, and destroy the attachment of our citizens to their country, and if we wish that our institutions should be cherished in the affections of the people, we ought, with "even-handed justice," to extend equal protection and apply the same rules to all.

In every view, then, said Mr. H., which he could take of this bill, he was compelled to oppose it. He was willing, nay, most anxious, that some relief should be extended to honest and insolvent debtors, but he wished that relief to be founded on sound principles, to be salutary, efficient, and, above all, commensurate with the evil. He had indulged the hope that such a system as he was disposed to advocate would have been reported by the Judiciary Committee, to whom had been referred, early in the session, a number of petitions, (and among them, one which Mr. H. had the honor to present from the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston,) all praying for a uniform bankrupt or insolvent law. Such a law, said Mr. H., could only be digested, and its details be arranged, in a committee, and, in order to test the opinion of the Senate on the bill before them, as well as to ascertain whether they concurred in the views he had submitted, he would move that the bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," be committed to the Judiciary Committee, with certain instructions, which he would now submit. The vote on committing the bill, he was willing to consider as a decision on its merits, and he would not call for a vote on his instructions, unless that decision should be against the bill. It would be perceived that the instructions were not intended to point out the particular provisions of any bill on this subject, but were so drawn as to embrace in the inquiry the whole subject of bankrupt and insolvent laws, both as to their constitutionality and expediency; so that the committee, having a full view of the whole ground, might be able to digest such a plan as should be best adapted to the circumstances of the country, and best promote those wise and beneficent objects which we all have in view.

Mr. H. concluded, by moving that the bill be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the release of all persons who may be arrested for debt, by virtue of any process issued from the State courts, or courts of the United States, when such persons shall render on oath a schedule of all their property and execute an assignment thereof for the benefit of their creditors; and that the committee do further inquire how far it may be expedient to provide by law for the release of such debtors from further liability, making, at the same time, suitable provision for the prevention and punishment of fraud and concealment.

When Mr. H. had concluded—

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke in answer to Mr. HAYNE, and in favor of the bill before the Senate; he was opposed to its commitment.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, made some remarks in relation to the connexion between the principles of this bill and a system of bankruptcy. He reviewed the course which had been pursued in relation to former bills to establish systems of bankruptcy. He thought Congress was hardly prepared, at this late period of the session, to go into the discussion of the various provisions of a bankrupt bill.

Mr. HAYNE replied to Mr. HOLMES.

Mr. TALBOT opposed the commitment of the bill, and advocated its passage to a third reading—not as the best system that could be adopted, but as better, for the relief of the unfortunate debtor, than the existing laws. He denied the power of Congress to pass insolvent laws.

Mr. VAN BUREN considered that the recommitment of the bill would be tantamount to its rejection, for the present session, at least. He went on to remark, briefly, upon the probable result of again committing the bill.

Mr. MACON spoke in favor of the passage of this bill, and commented upon the effects of imprisonment for debt, in relation to individuals, and to the community at large.

Mr. NOBLE moved the indefinite postponement of the whole subject. This motion was put, and decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Gaillard, Hayne, King of New York, Knight, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Van Dyke, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Branch, Eaton, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, Josiah S. Johnston, Kelly, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, Macon, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, and Van Buren.

Mr. FINDLAY supported the motion to recommit the bill, on the ground that it required amendment in its details.

The question on committing the bill, with the instructions proposed by Mr. HAYNE, was divided; and first taken on committing merely. This was carried in the affirmative—18 to 17.

On the question upon instructing the committee, as proposed by Mr. HAYNE, a few remarks were made by the mover, and Messrs. MILLS and VAN BUREN. The latter part of those instructions, which respects the inquiry into the expediency of releasing those debtors who make assignments of their property for the benefit of their creditors from further liability, was agreed to, and the other part was rejected.

WEDNESDAY, April 7.

On motion, by Mr. CHANDLER, the Committee on the Militia were discharged from the consideration of the memorial of the Society of Shakers in New York; and, on motion by Mr. MILLS, the said motion was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing for the appointment of an agent for the Osage Indians, west of the State of Missouri, and Territory of Arkansas; and for other purposes," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

DRAWBACK ON CORDAGE.

The bill "to allow drawback on the exportation of cordage, manufactured of foreign hemp," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. D'WOLF made a few remarks on the subject, and Mr. LANMAN moved a new section to the bill, limiting its operation to the term of three years. This was agreed to.

Mr. TALBOT thought the bill ought to be postponed, until some decision should be had upon the Tariff bill, now before the other House. He moved the postponement of the bill to Monday next.

Mr. SMITH opposed the postponement, and advocated the bill, to which Mr. TALBOT replied. He opposed the allowance of drawback on cordage manufactured of foreign hemp, on the ground of its prejudicial operation upon the domestic growth of hemp.

Mr. RUGGLES spoke in favor of the bill. He denied the position that the drawback would operate against the hemp of our own growth—the drawback being already allowed on the exportation of the hemp, if not manufactured. He thought the industry and skill of our own citizens ought to be encouraged, by giving them the privilege of exporting this article, with the benefit of drawback, when it has received the additional value which their labor has given to it. He adverted to the policy of England in regard to her drawback system, and he contended that this measure would give additional aid to our commercial and manufacturing interests, and place us, in foreign markets, on a footing with the English. He spoke particularly of the advantages that would result to us, in our trade to South America, by the allowance of drawback on this article.

Mr. DICKERSON objected to any connexion between this bill and the tariff bill. He was opposed to the principles of the bill, and in favor of postponement.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, thought the only consideration in favor of the postponement of this subject, was, its connexion with the tariff bill. It had been for a long while before the Senate; and the short time which remained for the transaction of the great mass of business before Congress, seemed to require, that it should be acted upon. He should, therefore, vote against postponement. He combatted the idea that the measure would injure our domestic growth of hemp. He thought it a narrow policy, indeed, to allow the drawback upon the imported raw material, and deny it upon the same article, when manufactured in our own country. He adverted to the beneficial effects which had resulted from the allowance of drawback upon other articles, and to the general advantages of the drawback system, which had been adopted as one of our principles of trade, from the very origin of our Government.

Mr. LOWRIE said, that he had found reason to change some of the opinions which induced him to vote against this bill, at the last session; but he still entertained some doubts on the subject, and his vote would now depend on the result of the tariff bill before the other House. He should be willing to vote for this bill, if it were so modified as to include hemp of domestic growth. He was not willing to do any thing to hurt the growth of this article, in our own country; as he thought its encouragement necessary to render us really independent of foreign nations. If the drawback, or bounty, were given on all cordage exported, without designation, it would tend to encourage the domestic growth of hemp. If the encouragement proposed in the bill now before the other House, were extended, he believed it would not be necessary to make such a provision in this bill, as that to which he had alluded. This he considered a very important bill. If the drawback were allowed on this article, he did not see why it should not also be allowed on iron, glass, and other articles. He was willing, however, to adopt the measure, in relation to cordage, provided the objection he had stated, could be removed. He was in favor of postponement.

Mr. D'WOLF again rose in support of the bill; briefly recapitulating, and referring to the reasons he had urged in favor of it, on its former discussion.

Mr. TALBOT spoke of the advantages possessed by the Western States for the growth of hemp—he believed that, with a reasonable degree of encouragement, six of the Western States would, in a short time, produce a sufficient quantity of this article to supply the consumption of the country. He avowed his perfect readiness to vote for this bill, if its friends were willing to extend its advantages as well to the domestic as to the foreign article; and intimated his willingness to withdraw his motion to postpone; and to move that the bill should be amended, by striking out from it the word "foreign," and thereby do away the distinction objected to.

Mr. EATON hoped that the gentleman would not withdraw his motion for postponement; and stated some reasons which induced him to wish that the bill might be postponed for the present. To this Mr. TALBOT assented; and the bill was postponed to Monday next.

INDIAN FUR TRADE.

The bill "to enable the President to carry into effect the treaty made at Ghent, the 24th December, 1814, excluding foreigners from trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States, and to preserve the fur trade within the limits of the said United States to American citizens," was again taken up for consideration; Mr. KNIGHT was called to the chair. The question was, upon an amendment offered by Mr. BARTON, proposing a new section as a substitute for the third section of the bill.

The proposed amendment provides that the office of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, at St. Louis, and the present Indian Agency, on the waters of the Upper Missouri, shall be abolished; and authorizes the President to appoint Indian Agents, to be stationed among the Indian tribes, on the waters of the Upper Missouri. It makes it the duty of the Superintendents and Agents of Indian Affairs to prevent all citizens of the United States from hunting and trapping, on any Indian lands, and to enforce the laws against all such persons as shall be guilty of those offences—for which purpose, these superintendents and agents are to be authorized to call upon the nearest military posts of the United States for aid.

Mr. BARTON explained the objects of the amendment he had proposed. Mr. BENTON opposed, at considerable length, the first part of the amendment, providing for the abolition of the offices therein specified; but was willing to adopt the latter part of it, and thus re-enact the provisions of an act for 1802.

Mr. LOWRIE moved to amend the amendment, by striking out that part which proposes to abolish the present Indian Agency on the Upper Missouri. This was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON replied to the remarks of Mr. BENTON, in relation to the proposed amendment.

Mr. BENTON again addressed the Senate, against the proposition to abolish the office of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, at St. Louis.

Without taking the question on the amendment, the Senate adjourned till to-morrow.

THURSDAY, April 8.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting the general accounts from the 1st of July, 1822, to the 30th June, 1823; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James Lloyd, of Indiana, who prays for a pension, in consequence of wounds received in the service of the United States, as a marine; and, on motion of Mr. NOBLE, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his papers.

On motion, by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Elkanah English, and of David Martin.

Mr. HAYNE presented the petition of John Bloomfield and others, aliens of the city of Charleston, in South Carolina, praying for such a modification of the alien laws, as will facilitate the naturalization of aliens; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act providing for the appointment of an agent for the Osage Indians, west of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes," was read, and passed to a second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the first amendment to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1824;" they agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on said amendment, and have appointed managers at the same on their part.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose to request some member who voted for the recommitment of the bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," to do him the favor to move a reconsideration of that vote. His wish was to have a distinct vote taken on the bill. Such a vote would not affect the proposition contained in the instructions which were given to the committee, on the recommitment of the bill, at the instance of the honorable member from South Carolina. He did not wish to press the subject upon the Senate, but hoped that an opportunity would be given to him to record his vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS, who had voted in favor of recommitment, moved, in order to meet the wishes of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the vote by which the bill was recommitted should be reconsidered.

Mr. HAYNE opposed the reconsideration of that vote. He said he had stated, when he made the motion to recommit the bill, that he wished no member, who was in favor of the final passage of the bill, would vote for its recommitment; and he considered that vote as distinctly expressing the sense of the Senate on that subject. Mr. H. proceeded to consider the principles of the bill, and said, he believed it altogether an inefficient remedy for the evils which were intended to be met by it. With this view, he had moved to instruct the committee, on the recommitment of the bill, to inquire into the expediency of instituting a general system of bankruptcy. He hoped the vote to recommit would not be reconsidered.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke in favor of reconsideration; and proceeded to show why this bill ought to be passed, without reference to a bankrupt system.

Mr. LOWRIE had not considered the vote to recommit, as deciding against the eventual passage of the bill. But, as it was now avowed to have taken place with a view to get rid of the bill, and, as he did not like to have it thrown out of the Senate in that way, he should vote for its reconsideration.

Mr. MILLS was opposed to reconsideration. He considered the vote to commit, as a decision on the part of the Senate, that the bill, patched as it was with amendments, ought not to pass, in its present shape. He went on to make some further remarks against the bill itself, and against the reconsideration. He thought it ought not to be taken up again, in its present form, at the present session of Congress.

Some further discussion, involving the principles of the bill, took place—in which Messrs. MACON, HOLMES, of Maine, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, VAN BUREN, FINDLAY, LLOYD, of Massachusetts, CHANDLER, J. S. JOHNSTON, MILLS, TAYLOR, of Virginia, and NORLE, engaged. The question was then taken on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was recommitted, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Branch, Chandler, Eaton, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, J. S. Johnston, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Ruggles, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, and Van Buren—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Clayton, D'Wolf, Edwards, Gaillard, Hayne, King of New York, Knight, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Mills, Noble, Parrott, Seymour, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams—18.

The vote to recommit the bill having been thus reconsidered, the question again recurred upon recommitting it. That question was decided in the negative without division.

Mr. HAYNE then moved that the further consideration of the bill should be indefinitely postponed. He proceeded to show the objections which existed, in his mind, to the passage of this bill. He was perfectly willing to vote for a system which should relieve the honest debtor; and he believed such an one might be easily drawn, in which the rights of the creditor and the debtor might be preserved; but he believed this bill to be altogether inadequate to that effect.

MESSRS. VAN BUREN, J. S. JOHNSTON, BRANCH, TALBOT, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, addressed the Senate in favor of the bill, and Messrs. MILLS and HAYNE against it.

The question on postponing the bill indefinitely was then put, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Gaillard, Hayne, King of New York, Knight, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Branch, Chandler, Eaton, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, J. S. Johnston, Kelly, Lanman, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, and Van Buren—21.

The Senate having thus refused to postpone the bill indefinitely, it came up again for consideration. Some amendments, in its details, were proposed by Messrs. EATON, HOLMES of Maine, TALBOT, and VAN DYKE, and were agreed to. The question was then taken, on passing the bill to be engrossed and read the third time, and was carried in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, April 9.

On motion, by Mr. SEYMOUR, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the consideration of the petition of James Thomas, and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion, by Mr. KING, of New York, a member was appointed on the Committee on Indian Affairs, in place of Mr. EDWARDS, of Illinois, (appointed Minister to Mexico;) and Mr. HAYNE was appointed.

The bill, entitled "An act providing for the appointment of an Indian agent for the Osage Indians, west of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill "to abolish imprisonment for debt," was read the third time. Objections were then made to certain parts of the bill, by Messrs. LANMAN, MILLS, VAN DYKE, and HAYNE—which were replied to by Messrs. TALBOT, VAN BUREN, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky. One or two immaterial amendments were made, by general consent. An amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, was objected to by Mr. HAYNE—and one submitted by Mr. VAN BUREN, was objected to by Mr. LOWRIE; they could not, therefore, be received; as no amendment can be considered, after the third reading of a bill, except by general consent.

The question was then taken, on the final passage of the bill, and carried in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Branch, Eaton, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, Josiah S. Johnston, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, Van Buren, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Gaillard, Hayne, King of New York, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Van Dyke, and Ware—19.

So the bill passed the Senate.

The usual question on the title being put, Mr. MILLS moved that it be stricken out. He thought the provisions of the bill did not concur with its title—and that it was holding out an appearance of a general abolition of imprisonment for debt, when such a thing was not to be effected by the bill. He proposed to substitute the following: "A bill to regulate the processes of the courts of the United States, in certain cases." This was objected to by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, TALBOT, and HOLMES, of Maine. It was contended, by the friends of the bill, that they ought, at least, to have the privilege of naming their own child—that there could be no harm in leading the people to the sweet belief, for a few weeks, at least, that imprisonment for debt was to be abolished—and that, as so many amendments had been made in the bill, the title, being the best remaining part of it, ought not to be lost. The question was then put, upon striking out the title of the bill, and decided in the negative.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the title, by adding to it the words, "in certain cases;" so as to read, "a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, in certain cases." This was not agreed to. The original title was approved; and the bill sent to the other House for concurrence.

PROTECTION OF THE FUR TRADE.

The unfinished business of Wednesday last, being the further consideration of the bill "to enable the President to carry into effect the treaty made at Ghent, the 24th December, 1814, excluding foreigners from trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States, and to preserve the fur trade within the limits of the said United States to American citizens," was then taken up; Mr. KNIGHT in the Chair.

The question was upon the adoption of a new section, proposed by Mr. BARTON, as a substitute for the third section of the bill. The amendment provides, that the office of superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis shall be abolished, and authorizes the President to appoint a certain number of Indian agents, to be stationed among the Indian tribes on the waters of the Upper Missouri. It makes it the duty of the superintendents and agents of Indian affairs, to prevent all citizens of the United States from hunting and trapping on any Indian lands, and to enforce the laws against all such persons as shall be guilty of those offences; for which purpose, the superintendents and agents are to be authorized to call upon the nearest military posts of the United States for aid.

On the suggestion of Mr. BENTON, the motion was divided, and the question put upon striking out the third section of the bill, which authorizes the appointment of two sub-agents, to be employed among the Indian tribes on the waters of the Upper Missouri, with annual salaries of $800 each. Some remarks were made by Messrs. BENTON and BARTON; and, the question being put, the Senate refused to strike out the third section.

Mr. LOWRIE moved to strike out the fifth section of the bill. It provides an appropriation of $13,000 "to enable the President to cause a competent military force to be transported to, and stationed at, such point on the Upper Missouri, as he shall deem best calculated to effect the objects of this bill." Mr. L. said he thought it would be quite time enough for us to take measures for the protection of our fur trade, when we had succeeded in preventing our own citizens from hunting and trapping on the Indian territories.

Mr. BENTON read some documents in relation to the expense of the proposed expedition, and to prove its necessity as a means for protection to, and increase of, our valuable fur trade. He said the only question was, whether the fur trade was worth the expense of supporting four companies to protect it. He believed it was well worth the expense.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, thought that a single post would be altogether inadequate to the contemplated object. A line of posts would be necessary, which would involve the country in great expense. He adverted to the question of our right to invade the Indian territory with an armed force. We have the power to do it, but he denied the right. It was entering again into a course of policy which the Government had, after mature deliberation, relinquished.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, spoke of the establishment of military posts, for the protection of our frontiers, as a necessary power, and one which had been always been exercised by the Government. He contended for the power and the right of extending protection against the aborigines on the Western waters, and for the preservation of the fur trade. Mr. J. proceeded to show the necessity of a military post in the quarter of the country mentioned in this bill.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, replied to Mr. JOHNSON. He was disposed to do every thing necessary for the protection of the West; but did not believe this measure to be requisite for that purpose. He did not consider this a question appertaining merely to the Western country, for many of the Western members had, as he recollected, voted against the appropriation for the Yellow Stone expedition. He again alluded to the necessity of a line of posts for the protection of that to be established by this bill.

Mr. MILLS said, if satisfied of the necessity of this measure, he should not inquire whether it was for the good of the East or the West, or what was the expense. He thought the first part of the bill very proper. As far as negotiation went, he approved it. We had always considered these tribes as independent nations, and treated them as such. He was willing to negotiate with them on this subject; but was not willing to march a military force into their country in time of peace. He reverted to the policy of this Government towards the Indians; to the character of our treaties with them; and the tenure by which they hold their lands. When we are at war with these Indian nations, we have undoubtedly a right to march our troops into, and take possession of, their country; but he denied, altogether, the right to do this in time of peace. He thought the Indians were already sufficiently restricted in their rights, without intrenching upon those which they possess. They have as good a right to carry their furs to the British, as to any other traders; as much so, as we have to sell our goods to whomsoever we choose. Mr. M. thought the principal difficulties with the Indians arose from the infringement of their rights by our citizens in hunting and trapping on the Indian grounds. He was in favor of striking out the fifth section.

Mr. BENTON replied to Mr. MILLS. He referred to the first section of the bill, as doing away the objection which had been made to the fifth—as it provides for the negotiation referred to. He said the question was not, whether we should prevent the Indians from selling their furs to whomsoever they please, but, whether we shall prevent British traders from coming into our own territory to trade with the Indians. He spoke of the expense which the country had incurred in protecting our commerce against the Barbary Powers; and drew a comparison between those Powers and the Indian tribes on our Western frontiers.

The question on striking out the fifth section of the bill was then put, and carried in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Ware—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Hayne, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, J. S. Johnston, Kelly, and Talbot—12.

Mr. KING, of New York, spoke briefly upon the principles of the bill, to which Mr. BENTON replied.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON proposed a new section, by way of amendment; which was the same as the fifth section just stricken out, except that the consent of the Indian tribes shall be obtained, previous to the establishment of the contemplated military post. Mr. J. proceeded to support the amendment, by a reference to our various relations with the Indians; he alluded to the remarks of Mr. MILLS, and contended for the right to establish the post even without their consent.

Mr. MILLS replied, and supported the ground he had formerly taken in regard to the territorial independence of the Indians. He spoke of our relations with the Indians in regard to civil matters; such as the commission of crimes, &c. If they commit murders, or other crimes among themselves, Mr. M. said, they were not held amenable to our laws—they were considered, by our treaties, as distinct nations, and independent of us.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, was still opposed to this project for sending a military force into the Indian country—he thought it would be time enough to consider this plan, after their consent had been obtained by treaty.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the bill was ordered to lie on the table, and the amendments to be printed.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, April 12.

Mr. KING, of New York, presented the petition of John H. Howland, praying the benefit of drawback of the duty on two hundred and thirty-seven boxes of sugar, exported by himself and others, from New York to Hamburg, in Europe; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, on motion, it was laid on the table.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, submitted the following motion for consideration:

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill entitled "An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals;" and, on motion, it was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill allowing a drawback on the exportation of cordage manufactured in the United States from foreign hemp; and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for the appointment of a Surveyor General of the lands of the United States, for the State of Louisiana, and one Surveyor General of the lands of the United States, for the State of Mississippi; and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas; and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Colonel William Duane; and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN BUREN laid on the table a letter from E. Causici, sculptor, announcing the completion of the model of the allegorical group intended for the Senate Chamber; and it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish a Surveyor General's office in the Territory of Arkansas; and, on motion, it was postponed.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the President to hold a treaty with the Indians owning the country on the south side of Lake Superior, for the purpose of extinguishing their title to certain districts supposed to contain valuable mines of copper; and, on motion, it was postponed until Friday next.

Mr. MACON said he thought it was quite time that Congress should be looking towards the time of adjournment; and, with a view to bring the subject before the Senate, he offered a joint resolution authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn the present session of Congress on the fourth day of May next.—The resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, "in addition to an act regulating the election of President and Vice President of the United States," was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. VAN BUREN submitted some additional sections as amendments to the bill; they were ordered to be printed, and the bill was then postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The bill from the House, "confirming certain acts of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

The bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, "to alter the time for holding the district court for the district of Missouri," was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VAN BUREN stated the grounds for making the proposed change. The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, "for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. This bill provides payment of certain repairs made in the circuit court room in the City of Washington.

Mr. EATON moved an amendment to the bill, to provide payment for some further items connected with those repairs.

Mr. CHANDLER made some remarks in relation to the expenditure of money, in such cases, without appropriations by Congress.

MESSRS. EATON, HOLMES, of Maine, BARBOUR, NOBLE, LOWRIE, LANMAN, SMITH, and MILLS, spoke upon this subject. The amendment was rejected. The bill was reported to the Senate, and was refused a third reading—15 in favor, 16 against it.

The bill reported by the Judiciary Committee "for the relief of Thomas Hewes," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. This bill provides for the repayment of a certain sum of money, paid into the Treasury by Mr. Hewes, on a bond; the amount having been previously paid. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, "to alter the time of holding the district courts of the United States for the district of Illinois," was taken up in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

CLAIM OF VIRGINIA.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

The Executive of Virginia having requested payment of the amount of interest, paid by the State, for moneys borrowed by it, for services rendered by the militia, in the late war, and such claim not being allowable, according to the uniform decisions of the accounting officers of the Government, I submit the subject to your consideration, with a report from the Secretary of War, and all the documents connected with it.

The following are the circumstances on which this claim is founded. From an early stage of the war, the squadrons of the enemy entered occasionally the Chesapeake Bay, and, menacing its shores, and those of the principal rivers emptying into it, subjected the neighboring militia to calls from the local authorities, for the defence of the parts thus menaced. The pressure was most sensibly felt in 1814, after the attack on this city, and its capture, when the invading force, retiring to its squadron, menaced alike Baltimore, Norfolk, and Richmond. The attack on this city had induced a call, by the Department of War, for large detachments of the militia of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, which, being collected in this quarter, and the enemy bearing, in the first instance, on Baltimore, were ordered to its defence. As early as the 31st of August, notice was given by the Secretary of War, to the Governor of Virginia, of the position of the enemy, and of the danger to which Richmond, as well as Norfolk and Baltimore, were exposed, and he was also authorized and enjoined to be on his guard, prepared at every point, and in every circumstance to meet and repel the invaders. This notice was repeated several times afterwards, until the enemy left the bay, and moved to the South.

SENATE.

Copy-rights of Paintings, &c.

In the course of the war, the State had augmented its taxes to meet the pressure; but, the funds being still inadequate, it borrowed money to a considerable amount, which was applied to the payment of the militia, for the services thus rendered. The calls which had been made, except for the brigades in this quarter, and at Norfolk, being made by the State, the settlement with those corps, and the payment for their services were made, according to the rules and usage of the Department, by the State, and not by the United States. On the settlement by the State, after the peace, with the accounting officers of the Government, the reimbursement of the interest, which the State had paid, on the sums thus borrowed, and paid by the militia, was claimed, but not allowed, for the reason above stated. It is this claim which I now submit to the consideration of Congress.

It need scarcely be remarked, that, where a State advances money for the use of the General Government, for a purpose authorized by it, that the claim for the interest of the amount thus advanced, which has been paid by the State, is reasonable and just. The claim is the stronger under the circumstances which existed when those advances were made, it being at a period of great difficulty, when the United States were compelled to borrow very large sums, for the prosecution of the war. Had the State not borrowed this money, the militia, whose services have been recognised since by the nation, must have been disbanded, and the State left without defence.

The claim is, in my opinion, equally well founded, when a State advances money which it has in its Treasury, or which it raises by taxes, to meet the current demand.

In submitting this claim to your consideration, it is proper to observe, that many other States have like claims with those of Virginia, and that all those similarly circumstanced should be placed on the same footing. I invite your attention to a principle, which is deemed just, and with the view, that the provision which may be made respecting it, may be extended alike to all the States.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THADDEUS MAYHEW.

On motion of Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the bill, reported by the Committee on Claims, "for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. This petitioner claims compensation for property in the vicinity of the city of New Orleans, taken by the United States troops, and for property destroyed by the British troops during the late war.

Mr. RUGGLES stated the grounds of the claim, and moved to fill the blank for the amount to be allowed with $1,298 50. This amount was to remunerate the petitioner for property taken for the use of the United States.

Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by adding a clause to grant compensation for a saw-mill, lumber, &c., belonging to this petitioner, destroyed by the British troops. Mr. J. made some remarks in support of this amendment; he stated the facts connected with the destruction of this property, and read several documents in relation thereto. He said the saw-mill in question was destroyed in consequence of its occupation by the American troops; and, if it was paid for, as he thought it ought to be, the whole sum to be allowed would be about twelve or thirteen thousand dollars.

Mr. RUGGLES replied to Mr. JOHNSON. He thought the petitioner had failed to establish the fact of the destruction of the saw-mill in consequence of its occupation by the United States troops, and proceeded to comment upon the evidence laid before the Committee on Claims. He contended that it was a principle that could never be adopted by the Government, to make compensation for all property destroyed by the enemy; it would consume more funds than the nation could command, and make it bankrupt at once.

Mr. JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, supported the amendment, and Mr. H. JOHNSON made some further remarks in answer to Mr. RUGGLES. The amendment was rejected. The blank in the bill was filled with $1,298 50. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

COPY-RIGHTS OF PAINTINGS, &c.

The bill "extending the benefit of copy-rights to the authors of paintings and drawings" was taken up in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MILLS stated some difficulties which he thought would attend the passage of this bill.

Mr. LOWRIE said he had been induced to introduce the bill by the remark of Mr. Peale, in relation to his portrait of WASHINGTON; he was applied to for the purchase of the painting, but said he should be unwilling to sell it, if he could not have the same privilege of profiting by his work as writers of books have in theirs. Mr. L. did not know why he should not have that privilege.

Mr. MILLS replied that, had such an act as this been in existence before Mr. Peale executed his paintings, he could not have completed it; as Stuart had previously executed a portrait of WASHINGTON, from which this of Mr. Peale's was but a copy, with some little embellishment. He thought such an act of Congress would have a great tendency to retard the progress of the art of painting, as it would do away the right of imitating and attempting to excel paintings already in existence.

Messrs. LANMAN, HOLMES, of Maine, LOWRIE, and TALBOT, made some remarks on the subject.

Mr. LOWRIE observed, that the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MILLS) would apply equally to all the patent laws, as it was equally as improper to give exclusive privileges to inventors of machines, &c., as to authors of paintings. The bill was reported to the Senate, and it was refused a third reading.

SARAH CHITWOOD.

The bill from the House, and which was reported by the Committee on Pensions in the Senate, "for the relief of Sarah Chitwood," was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NOBLE stated the grounds of this bill, and said that a majority of the Committee on Pensions were against the passage of the bill, and had instructed him to move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. LANMAN stated that the person for whose relief this bill was drawn, was the widow of an officer who was in the service of the United States during the late war. In consequence of hardship and fatigue in the service, he was taken sick; and, being in a deranged state of mind, was carried home by his family, and he died in nine days afterwards. Had his decease taken place before he was carried home, his widow would have obtained the pension allowed by law. Mr. L. contended that she came within the spirit if not within the letter of the law.

Messrs. EATON and H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, also supported the claim; and Messrs. CHANDLER and NOBLE opposed it, on the ground that the husband of the petitioner did not die in the service, and that if it was adopted as a principle, that the widows and orphans of persons contracting diseases in the public service, which caused their subsequent death, were to draw pensions, a general law to that effect ought to be passed; but, as the law at present only makes this provision for the relatives of those who actually die in the service, the pension ought not to be given to this petitioner any more than if her husband had died ten years after.

The bill was then indefinitely postponed.

TUESDAY, April 13.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act concerning invalid pensions," reported it with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution to authorize the purchase of a certain number of the copies of the Journals of Congress, from 1774 to 1788, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the same committee, reported the bill to provide for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States, without amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the same committee, reported the bill in further addition to "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," without amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill in further addition to "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the Message received yesterday from the President of the United States, in relation to the claim of the State of Virginia for interest on moneys borrowed for military purposes, during the late war, together with sundry documents relating to the same subject, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill "for the benefit of Thaddeus Mayhew;" the bill "giving the consent and sanction of Congress to certain acts of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida;" the bill "to alter the time for holding the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri;" the bill "for the relief of Thomas Hewes;" and the bill "to alter the time of holding the District Court of the United States in the District of Illinois;" were severally read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARTON, who had voted in the affirmative of the question yesterday, the vote by which the Senate refused a third reading to the bill "for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt," was reconsidered. The question again recurring on passing the bill to a third reading, the bill was supported by Messrs. LLOYD, of Maryland, EATON, TALBOT, BARBOUR, NOBLE, and SMITH, and opposed by Messrs. CHANDLER, LOWRIE, TAYLOR, of Virginia, FINDLAY, and MACON. This bill provides payment for certain fixtures in the Circuit Court room, in the City of Washington, which were made over and above the expenditure of the amount appropriated, at the last session, for the preparation of this court room. It was contended, on the one hand, that these fixtures were absolutely necessary for the accommodation of the Court, and that the persons who made them ought certainly to be paid. On the other hand, it was remarked that, although it was a hard case that these persons should lose the pay for their work, yet Congress should always express its decided disapprobation of any expenditures over the amount actually appropriated by law.

The question was put, upon passing the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 14. So the bill passed to be read the third time.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, "in addition to the act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States." The question was upon agreeing to certain additional sections, proposed by Mr. VAN BUREN as amendments.

Mr. VAN BUREN explained, concisely and clearly, the provisions of this bill, and the reasons which induced the committee to introduce it.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the amendments to the bill were ordered to lie on the table, in order that he might offer an amendment. Upon the amendment proposed by Mr. EATON, some remarks were made by the mover, and by Messrs. MILLS and VAN BUREN.

The bill and amendments were then ordered to lie on the table.

TIME OF ADJOURNMENT.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MACON, fixing the fourth day of May next, for the termination of the present session of Congress, was taken up for consideration.

Some remarks on the subject were made by Messrs. MACON, FINDLAY, BARBOUR, NOBLE, and RUGGLES. Mr. NOBLE moved that the resolution be ordered to lie on the table. This question was determined in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Kelly, King of Alabama, Knight, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Talbot, and Thomas—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Eaton, Elliott, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Jackson, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, King of New York, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Smith, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Van Buren, Ware, and Williams—14.

Mr. RUGGLES then moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed till Monday next. Upon this motion considerable debate arose, in which Messrs. RUGGLES, TALBOT, SMITH, HOLMES, of Maine, DICKERSON, MACON, and FINDLAY, took part. The motion for postponement till Monday prevailed.

COMMERCE WITH PORTUGAL.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be communicated to the Senate so much of the correspondence of the Minister of the United States at the Court of Portugal, as has reference to the commercial relations between the two countries; together with such other information connected therewith as may be in possession of the Government, and which, in his opinion, may, without injury to the public interest, be made known," was read for consideration.

Mr. LLOYD observed, that, as he introduced the resolution, it might be considered incumbent on him to state the views which had led him to do it. The resolution had reference rather to the respective aspects of our trade with that Kingdom, than to the present situation of it; the latter was too well known to be in a depressed and diminished state. For a long series of years our commercial relations with Portugal had been, he said, of the most beneficial and reciprocally acceptable character. It was a trade which seemed peculiarly to entitle itself to the favor of the political economists of the present day. It was a trade prosecuted almost entirely from the domestic or home productions of the United States—in the fish, in the provisions generally, and the pearl ashes of the North; but principally in the bread-stuffs—the corn, the wheat, the flour, the rice, and the staves of the South. Our exports in it, formerly, very much exceeded our imports; while we exported no specie to Portugal, but, at times, received considerable sums in dollars from it, as returns for our outward cargoes; and both these circumstances were strong recommendations of it to the same school.

Another course of this trade, was to send out to Portugal, from the United States, valuable cargoes of domestic produce; for we were allowed to carry none other, of any consequence, for the purpose of accumulating funds there for more distant objects; the vessels returning home with a ballast of salt, with a part of the proceeds of their outward cargoes invested in wines, and a very small part also in fruit, leaving the residue of their funds to furnish the specie means for the prosecution of our West India trade, the vessels touching at Lisbon, on their passage out, to receive it; and also to provide remittances to London and Amsterdam, in payment for cargoes of Russian and Swedish products, for our vessels to bring to the United States. This was the state of the trade formerly. All parties were satisfied with it, for it furnished the most steady market in Europe for our domestic productions; and the international feelings to which it gave rise were of the most grateful character. Mr. L. said he recollected, perfectly well, a conversation on this subject, which he had the honor to have, twelve or fourteen years since, with the very distinguished statesman then at the head of the Government, Mr. Madison, who remarked to him that, with no Power in Europe had our foreign relations been on so uniformly a friendly footing, as those with the Government of Portugal. He said we had never made a request to Portugal, which she had not acceded to.

Thus the intercourse between the two countries remained, Mr. L. believed, with the intermission of the late war, until the year 1816, when the tariff of that year operated so injuriously on the trade in the wines of Portugal, as to induce the Government of that country strongly to remonstrate against it, as a very onerous imposition on the principal article of her exports, and as unfriendly to her intercourse with us. Her remonstrances, however, being unavailing, after a time she resorted to another course, which, perhaps, before long, may be resorted to by other Powers than Portugal, and perhaps for more than one of the great staples of the country. She either excluded, altogether, the corn of the United States, or so heavily taxed it with our flour, as to amount nearly, if not entirely to a prohibition. And, on the other hand, as soon as the tariff of 1816 came into operation, the importation of Portugal wines immediately decreased more than one-half.

To remedy this unpleasant feeling, and the degraded commercial relations between the two countries, he had understood were the objects for which General Dearborn had been sent to Lisbon, with the expectation that he might be able to negotiate a commercial treaty, or make some acceptable arrangement with the Portuguese Government, which might restore the former good feelings and friendly intercourse between the two nations. The object of the proposed resolution was to ascertain how far this attempt had been successful, or what prospect there was that it might become so hereafter.

And while speaking on this subject, Mr. L. said, he thought it might not be wholly useless were he to retrace, very briefly, the effect that had been produced on the trade with Portugal, by the tariffs which had, at different times, been adopted in the United States, operating upon her principal article of export, her wines, and which, from self-defence, she would feel herself bound to protect; and the effect they had also produced on the trade of the United States with her.

In the earliest period of the Federal Government, on the enactment of the first tariff law, in 1790, a duty was laid on the wines of Portugal of eighteen cents a gallon on the high priced Madeira, and ten cents a gallon on Lisbon wine. This was a very low rate of duty. It was obvious the article was susceptible, without injury, of a much higher rate; accordingly, two years after, in 1792, when the law was revised, the duty was greatly increased, and fifty-six cents was then imposed on Madeira, and twenty-five cents per gallon on Lisbon wine; which probably was about as high a rate of duty as the articles would bear. And thus it remained until 1800, when the tariff was again advanced; but the wise men who then had in charge that law, judiciously supposed that the existing duty on wines had nearly reached the acme at which it would be productive; they, therefore, touched these articles very lightly, contenting themselves with imposing only two cents additional a gallon on Madeira wine, and five cents on Lisbon. Thus it remained, and the trade and intercourse between the two countries expanded, to their mutual benefit, until the tariff policy of 1816 prevailed. The effect of that policy became instantly visible. What it was, was an inquiry of some point, and would attract the attention of the Senate.

In the custom-house year, 1815-16, we imported into the United States—

Of Lisbon wine - - -	654,608 gallons.
Of Madeira - - -	314,891 do.

Then came the overwhelming tariff of 1816, which raised the duty 90 per cent. on Madeira, and more than sixty per cent. on Lisbon wine; and the very next succeeding year the importation of the first fell off nearly one-half—from 314,891 gallons, to 186,108 gallons; and of the second more than two-thirds—from 654,608 gallons, to 194,187 gallons; furnishing a good lesson for financiers. And the trade, he said, had remained crippled from that time to the present; for, in 1823, we imported only 130,067 gallons of Madeira, and 124,101 gallons of Lisbon wine—being less than one-half the quantity we had imported so long ago as twenty-five years, since which our population had more than doubled, and our agricultural products quadrupled.

The same tariff of 1816 had also affected our exports to Portugal in another way; it had almost extinguished the trade to Bengal, and the exportation of domestic produce, in part, to pay for it; a trade which formerly employed thirty or forty fine ships, and occupied eight or ten millions of dollars of capital; and another tariff bill, if it passed, imposing a heavy duty on hemp and iron, would deal out the same fate to about four times the same number and description of vessels now engaged in the trade with the North sea and the Baltic.

These were the views, Mr. L. said, which induced him to offer the resolution under consideration, and which he hoped it might be acceptable to the Senate to pass.

The resolution was agreed to, without division.

WEDNESDAY, April 14.

On motion, by Mr. NOBLE, the Senate resumed the motion of the 26th of March, to discharge the Committee on Pensions from the consideration of the resolution of the 27th of January, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of placing James Morrow on the pension list; and agreed thereto; and, on motion, by Mr. LOWRIE, James Morrow had leave to withdraw his papers.

The bill relative to the Patent Office, and to the salary of the Superintendent thereof; and the bill in further addition to "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," were severally read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States, and providing for the discipline thereof; and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

The bill for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McILVAINE, the Senate then proceeded to consider the bill "for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner." This bill was reported by the select committee on roads and canals. Mr. Skinner claims payment for work done on the Cumberland Road, over and above what he had contracted to do; for interest on moneys due him; and for expenses and losses sustained, in consequence of the failure in his payment. The committee report a detailed statement of the facts connected with the case; and, also, a bill referring the claims of the memorialist to the Secretary of the Treasury, with power to settle them on equitable principles. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BARBOUR gave notice that he should, tomorrow, ask leave to introduce a bill "for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris."

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, in addition to an act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States," was again taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole; Mr. GAILLARD in the Chair. The amendment offered yesterday by Mr. EATON, and those heretofore offered by Mr. VAN BUREN, were withdrawn, in order to give way for the introduction of an amendment by Mr. MILLS. Mr. M.'s motion was, to insert three new sections. The first of these sections provides that the Electors shall make five certificates of the votes given for President and Vice President; that one of these copies shall be sent by a special messenger; one by the Post Office, as at present; that two other copies shall be transmitted, on successive days, by mail; and the other copy be deposited as at present, in the office of the District Judge. The second section provides that five lists of the Electors shall be prepared by the Executive of each State. The third section prescribes the penalties of fine and imprisonment to be incurred by the special messenger, the postmaster, or any other person, who shall suppress, delay, or hinder, the transmission of these votes to the Seat of Government.

Mr. MILLS explained the operation of the several amendments he had proposed. Mr. VAN BUREN expressed his concurrence in them. The question was then taken upon them, severally. The two first were adopted without further discussion. The third, respecting the penalties, gave rise to a cursory discussion, the principal part of which turned upon the question whether the discretion, in respect to the quantum of punishment to be inflicted, should be left to the court, or to the jury. Mr. BARBOUR, who had moved to strike out "court," and insert "jury," in the bill, supported his amendment, by remarking, at some length, on the propriety of giving this power to the jury. Mr. KELLY spoke in favor of vesting it in the court. He cited several cases, in his part of the country, in which heavy damages had been awarded, by juries, for mere indiscretions. Messrs. HOLMES of Maine and FINDLAY submitted some remarks upon the proposed amendment. It was then rejected. The section was then adopted.

The first section of the original bill, as reported by the committee, was then read. Several amendments, in its details, were proposed by Mr. MILLS, and were agreed to by the Senate. The second section was afterwards read, and modified considerably, on the motion of Mr. VAN BUREN. Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, made some remarks upon the power of the two Houses of Congress to reject the Electoral votes.

The amendments heretofore proposed by Mr. VAN BUREN, were again taken up, and agreed to.

Mr. MILLS then proposed a new section, making it the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit a copy of this act to the Executive of each State, to be laid before the Electors of President and Vice President next to be chosen; and repealing all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this. The amendment was agreed to.

The details of the bill were further discussed by Messrs. EATON, VAN BUREN, HOLMES, of Maine, and CHANDLER. The further consideration of the bill was postponed till Friday next; and it was ordered to be printed, as amended.

THURSDAY, April 15.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred by a resolution of the Senate of the 3d February, reported a bill, in addition to an act, establishing navy hospitals; which was twice read by unanimous consent. He also laid on the table a letter and documents from the Secretary of the Navy, relating to said bill, and they were ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALBOT presented the memorial of Thomas Law and others, in behalf of sundry citizens of the United States, lately assembled at Washington, praying the establishment of a national currency; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BARBOUR asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, the Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the petition of Thomas Johnston; and, on motion, the report was ordered to lie on the table and be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of William Stedman, praying remuneration for losses sustained by the impressment of his property into the public service during the late war; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, the bill from the other House, "for the relief of Barbara Paulas," was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. Mr. L. stated the grounds of the bill. The petitioner was the mother of a seaman, lost in the sloop-of-war Wasp. An act of Congress was passed, for the relief of the relatives of those who were lost in that vessel, provided application was made for such relief within two years from the passing of the act. This petitioner, being in a very humble situation in life, neither knew of the passage of the act, nor of its limitation. She now prays for the benefit of the act, notwithstanding the expiration of the specified time; and the bill proposes to grant her prayer. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to a third reading.

The bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, "supplementary to the several acts providing for the settlement of claims to lands in the State of Missouri," was next taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. BARTON briefly stated the objects of the bill, and moved an amendment in relation to certain "commons" attached to the towns and villages in the State of Missouri. The amendment was adopted, and the bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill "for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner" was read the third time, passed, and sent to the other House for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, the bill reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, "for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church, Washington Parish," was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. This bill grants $2,000, to aid in the erection of a suitable fence around the burial ground, in which the members of the Government, who have deceased in the city of Washington, have been buried.

A discussion took place on the propriety of making this grant, in the course of which Messrs. LLOYD of Maryland, BARBOUR, and SMITH, supported the bill, and Messrs. MACON, CHANDLER, and TAYLOR of Virginia, opposed it. Mr. CHANDLER moved to reduce the appropriation to $1,000. This was not agreed to. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill reported by the Committee on Finance, "for the relief of Elijah Van Syckle," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. SMITH explained the objects of the bill. It proposes to give the person for whose relief it is drawn, an extension of time for the payment of duties on certain articles, which were destroyed by fire, in Philadelphia. Messrs. KING of New York, and LOWRIE made a few remarks on the subject. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, "for the relief of Thomas Shields," was next taken up in Committee of the Whole. The bill relates to the distribution of certain prize-money. Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, explained its object. It was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill from the House of Representatives, "to repeal the act for the relief of John P. Hogan," was then taken up in Committee of the Whole. Mr. RUGGLES explained its object. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to a third reading.

The bill from the other House, "authorizing the executors of Joseph P. Mebane to collect certain arrearages of internal taxes," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to a third reading.

The bill reported by the Committee on Finance, "authorizing the sale of a public warehouse at the former quarantine ground at the English Turn, and providing for the erection of a dwelling-house for the boarding officer at the mouth of the river Mississippi, and for other purposes," was taken up in Committee of the Whole. An amendment, proposed by Mr. EATON, limiting the expense of erecting the dwelling-house to the amount obtained for the warehouse, was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolutions providing a place of deposit for the portrait of Columbus, and directing the distribution of certain copies of the Declaration of Independence, now in the Department of State; and, on motion, they were ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the appointment of an Indian agent for the Osage Indians, west of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes;" and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals;" and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensions;" and, on motion, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill in further addition to "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization;" and, on motion, it was laid on the table.

FRIDAY, April 16.

A communication was received from the delegation of the Cherokee Nation, at present at the Seat of Government, relative to the late Message of the President to Congress, on the Indian titles to lands in the State of Georgia, and animadverting on the paper presented to the President of the United States, by the Georgia delegation in Congress.

The communication being read, Mr. ELLIOTT said he objected to a contest of this character, in this place, with the Cherokee delegation. He knew them only as other Indians, and to be treated with as such. If they claim to represent an independent nation, why do they address this body directly, and not through the Department of State? But, if they seek to be heard in their real character, they should present their claims to our consideration, through the War Department. The course now attempted, is novel and inadmissible, and he hoped the communication would lie on the table. It was then ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Alexander McNair, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. BARTON, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the 29th ultimo, directing an inquiry whether further legislation be necessary to enable the several towns and villages in Missouri to establish the boundaries of their commons, and to dispose of them; on the ground that this subject is sufficiently provided for by an amendment to a bill concerning town and village lots and out lots, &c., heretofore reported to the Senate by the committee.

The bill "for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris" had its second reading, and was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, gave notice that, on Monday next, he should ask leave to introduce a bill "to provide for the punishment of certain crimes when committed in any navy yard, fort, arsenal, magazine, dock, lighthouse, tract of land, or other place belonging to the United States."

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Colonel William Duane; and it was postponed to Monday next.

The bills from the House of Representatives, "for the relief of Barbara Paulas;" to repeal the act for the relief of John B. Hogan;" "authorizing the executors of Joseph B. Mebane to collect certain arrearages of internal taxes;" were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill "supplementary to the act providing for the settlement of claims to lands in the State of Missouri;" the bill "for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church, Washington Parish;" the bill "for the relief of Elijah Van Syckle, of Philadelphia;" the bill "for the relief of Thomas Shields;" and the bill "providing for the sale of the public warehouse at the former quarantine ground near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, for the erection of a dwelling-house at the Balize, in the same State, for the boarding officer, and for other purposes;" were severally read the third time, passed, and sent to the other House for concurrence.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

The bill "in addition to the act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States," was again taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. Several verbal amendments were made to the bill, on motion of Mr. VAN BUREN. The bill was then reported to the Senate.

Some further amendments were made, in its details, at the suggestion of Messrs. EATON, MILLS, VAN BUREN, and SMITH. Upon fixing the time of delivery of the votes at the Seat of Government, some debate took place between Messrs. MILLS, MACON, VAN BUREN, LOWRIE, WILLIAMS, and KING, of Alabama. The first Wednesday of January was eventually fixed as the time. The several amendments were then agreed to, by the Senate.

Mr. MACON objected to the general principles of the bill, on the ground that it was not necessary; and would, as he thought, have a tendency to create the very difficulties it proposed to remedy—he thought, too, that Congress had no power to legislate on the subject.

Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, and VAN BUREN, replied to the objections advanced by Mr. MACON.

The bill was then passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

MONDAY, April 19.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, submitted the following resolution, with a request that it might be forthwith taken into consideration; as it related to a communication from the President of the United States, in relation to a claim of the State of Virginia, and he wished all the documents printed together:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate, whether the Executive, through the agency of the War Department, borrowed any money, during the last year, under the condition of applying the same to the defence of the State wherein the said loans were made, and to what amount; and whether interest was paid by the United States for such loans, or if they sustained any loss by giving stock or Treasury notes for them; including any other information in relation to the subject which he may think proper to communicate.

The resolution was taken into consideration by general consent, and it was agreed to.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, the Committee on Finance were discharged from the consideration of the letter of E. Causici, sculptor, on the subject of the allegorical group intended for the Senate chamber; and, also, from the memorial of Thomas Law and others, on the subject of a national currency.

The bill "in addition to the acts relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States," was read the third time, passed, and sent to the House for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the rule by which the Senate determined to adjourn, on each week, from Friday to the next Monday, was rescinded.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a petition respecting the purchase of an Orrery, for the Military Academy at West Point, submitted a report on that subject, recommending that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Secretary of War. The report was agreed to.

The same committee was also discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Messrs. Willard and Childs, that subject being now under consideration in the other House.

The bill reported by the Committee of Claims "for the relief of Alexander McNair," had its second reading.

The bill "to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," was received from the House of Representatives, and read. Mr. DICKERSON moved for the second reading of the bill, at the present time. This was objected to by several members; and, consequently, the second reading cannot take place until to-morrow.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the memorial of M. S. Johns, and others, of Pennsylvania, praying that a heavy duty may be imposed on sales at auction; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. EATON gave notice that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to bring in a bill to amend an act, supplemental to an act, entitled "An act to carry into effect the 9th article of a treaty concluded between the United States and Spain, the 22d day of February, 1819," approved the 3d of March, 1823.

APRIL, 1824.

Columbian College.

SENATE.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to amend the judicial system of the United States, and provide for the holding of circuit courts; and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, proposed an amendment thereto; which was read, and on motion, the bill was postponed to Wednesday next; and the proposed amendment ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIAN COLLEGE.

Mr. BARBOUR from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the Trustees of the Columbian College, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the Columbian College, in the District of Columbia; which were read, and the bill passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. The report is as follows:

They have given to this subject the consideration which its importance claimed. The object of the memorial is to obtain pecuniary aid, to a small amount, to the Columbian College, in this District, whose prosperity, in an essential degree, depends on the success of the application. The utility of a central literary establishment has been so often presented to Congress, by the long list of illustrious worthies who have filled the Presidential chair, that the committee are relieved from the necessity of adding any remarks of their own on this topic. They content themselves by referring to the following extracts from communications made in a series of years, by successive Presidents, to Congress. President Washington, in his Message of December, 1796, in reference to such an establishment, uses the following remark: "Among the motives to such an institution, the assimilation of the principles, opinions, and manners, of our countrymen, by the common education of a portion of our youth from every quarter, well deserves attention. The more homogeneous our citizens can be made in these particulars, the greater will be our prospect of permanent union."

President Madison, in his Message of December, 1810, on this subject, uses the following language: "Whilst it is universally admitted that a well instructed people alone can be a permanently free people, and whilst it is evident that the means of diffusing and improving useful knowledge form so small a portion of the expenditures for national purposes, I cannot presume it to be unreasonable to invite your attention to the advantages of superadding to the means of education, provided by the several States, a seminary of learning, instituted by the National Legislature, within the limits of their exclusive jurisdiction, the expense of which might be defrayed, or reimbursed out of the vacant grounds which have accrued to the nation within those limits." "Such an institution, though local in its legal character, would be universal in its beneficial effects. By enlightening the opinions, by expanding the patriotism, and by assimilating the principles, the sentiments, and the manners of those who might resort to this temple of science, to be re-distributed, in due time, through every part of the community—sources of jealousy and prejudice would be diminished, the features of national character would be multiplied, and greater extent given to social harmony. But, above all, a well constituted seminary, in the centre of the nation, is recommended by the consideration, that the additional instruction emanating from it would contribute not less to strengthen the foundations, than to adorn the structure of our free and happy system of Government."

These recommendations, from causes enumeration is now unnecessary, if, indeed, it were practicable, failed in their effect. At length a few enterprising and patriotic individuals attempted to achieve, by voluntary donations, that which it had been supposed could be effected only by the power of Congress.

Their efforts were crowned with distinguished success. One individual in particular, (and it is but an act of justice he should be named,) the Rev. Luther Rice, with an unwearied industry and an unyielding perseverance, which prompted him to traverse every part of the Union in pursuit of aid to this beneficent object, contributed principally to that success.

The funds thus acquired were faithfully and judiciously applied to the object. An advantageous site was procured, and suitable buildings erected, for the accommodation of one hundred students. Application was made to Congress for an act of incorporation, which passed February 9, 1821. This, however, was all the aid which Congress dispensed. The accompanying document shows that there have been expended on this institution $80,000—$50,000 only have been procured; and, as a consequence, the institution is embarrassed with a debt to the amount of $30,000. By reference to the same document, it appears that, although the college commenced its operation so late as January, 1822, it has already ninety-three students, under the direction of a faculty highly respectable for its literary attainments.

The embarrassments resulting from the debt present considerable difficulties, and threaten, if not entire ruin, greatly to retard its successful progress.

Under these circumstances, the individuals who have thus generously devoted themselves to the promotion of this establishment, and who have disinterestedly pledged their independence upon the success of the college, present themselves to Congress, with a view to obtain their protection by a small pecuniary grant—Congress being the only legislative body they can address, as they are denied, by their locality, all aid from any particular State.

The committee, in reviewing the peculiar circumstances which characterize the origin of this establishment, its progress, and the great benefits it promises to society, are of opinion that the application is reasonable. It cannot be doubted, had such an establishment grown up, under similar circumstances, in either of the States, it would receive the helping hand of its Legislature. Congress stands in the same relation to this establishment, from its exclusive power of legislation within the District. It may be objected, however, that the right of Congress to appropriate the funds of the nation to a purpose in part local, however national its effects, is questionable. The committee intentionally forbear to discuss this question, as, upon it, a difference of opinion is believed to exist, and as its decision is not necessary to the successful result of the proposed measure.

In the extract from the Message of President Madison, Congress is referred to a fund from which pecuniary aid may be derived, free from all objections—the public property within the District. This property was granted by the original proprietors, on the condition that its avails should be appropriated to the improvement of the city. It appears, by reference to a report prepared on this subject, that, with sales already effected, and a reasonable estimate on the remainder, the amount of this property is equal to $2,571,016; of this there has been expended on the public buildings $1,214,292, leaving a balance in favor of the District of $1,356,724; from this estimate is excluded the expenses of rebuilding, which cannot, with justice, be charged to this fund, as thereby a national misfortune would be made to fall exclusively on the people of Washington, instead of the nation at large. If from this last sum be deducted what has been expended on the central building, and on all other public improvements in the city, equal to $1,025,916, there would still be a balance in favor of the District of $330,808. In addition to the high authority already alluded to, the committee beg leave to refer to the course uniformly adopted in all the Territories. By reference to the various acts of Congress, it will be seen that a large portion of the public lands has there been set apart for the purposes of education. Without a specification, they content themselves by saying that one-thirty-sixth part of the whole land of the United States has been appropriated to this purpose. The committee, therefore, beg leave to report a bill dispensing aid, to a limited extent, to the Columbian College. They have been induced to grant the debts referred to in the bill for two reasons. The one, that they are within the District; and the other, that the larger debt, from the questionable condition of the debtors, will be difficult to collect. Its collection or arrangement may, nevertheless, be made available to some extent, when transferred to the trustees of the college. The debt from the estate of Mr. Lee is for property sold within the District.

TIME OF ADJOURNMENT.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the resolution proposed by him, some days since, fixing a time for closing the present session of Congress, was taken up for consideration. That resolution specified the 4th of May, as the day of adjournment. The "4th" was, on motion, stricken out; when

Mr. TALBOT moved to fill the blank with the "15th day." Some remarks were made upon this subject, by Messrs. TALBOT, MACON, HOLMES, of Maine, DICKERSON, VAN DYKE, and BROWN.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to postpone the resolution to Monday next.

This motion was decided in the negative—yeas 21, nays 24.

Mr. VAN DYKE moved to fill the blank in the resolution with the "18th" as the day of adjournment. This was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. TALBOT's motion, for filling the blank with "the 15th." Mr. EATON spoke in favor of that day, as the great and important subjects before the Senate could not possibly be disposed of before that time.

Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, SMITH, RUGGLES, TAYLOR, of Virginia, and NOBLE, made some further remarks upon the subject. Mr. RUGGLES moved to lay the resolution on the table—this motion was decided in the negative, yeas 22, nays 24.

The question then recurred on filling the blank with the "15th."

Messrs. KING, of Alabama, and H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, spoke in favor of an early day of adjournment.

Mr. DICKERSON said, he should consider the determination of the Senate to fix an early day for adjournment, as tantamount to the rejection of the important bill (the Tariff bill) which has just come from the other House.

The Senate then decided in favor of filling the blank with the 15th—yeas 25, nays 21. So the resolution fixes the 15th day of May, for adjournment of Congress—it was then passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

TUESDAY, April 20.

Mr. MILLS presented the petition of Henry Huttleston, praying indemnity for depredations committed on his property by France, in the years 1807 and 1808; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Alexander Scott, late collector of customs for the port of Pensacola, in the Territory of Florida, praying to be allowed, in the settlement of his accounts, the same compensation that is allowed to other collectors in that Territory; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of John H. Howland, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of John H. Howland. The report and bill were read, and the bill passed to the second reading.

In pursuance of notice given on Friday last, Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, asked leave to introduce a bill "to provide for the punishment of crimes, when committed in any navy yard, fort, arsenal, magazine, dock, lighthouse, tract of land, or other place belonging to the United States." Mr. L. said that, in introducing this bill, it was only necessary now to remark that, such was the peculiar nature of our laws, a man might commit murder within an arsenal or fort, or other place under the immediate jurisdiction of the United States; and unless he was reached by the bullet or the bayonet of the soldier, he could not be touched. There was no law by which he could be called to answer for the crime. Leave to introduce the bill was accordingly granted. The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAYNE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate the number of arms furnished by the State of South Carolina to the United States during the late war, and which have been substantiated at the proper department; and, also, whether any arrangements have been made for the settlement of the demand, and what legal provisions may be necessary to carry the same into effect.

Mr. VAN DYKE laid on the table a communication from the President of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, soliciting the patronage of Government by a subscription to their stock.

Duty on Imports.

SENATE.

Referred to the select Committee on Roads and Canals.

The joint resolution, fixing the 15th day of May next, for the adjournment of the present session of Congress, was read the third time. Mr. NOBLE moved that it be ordered to lie on the table. This motion was not agreed to. The resolution was then passed, and sent to the other House for concurrence.

In pursuance of notice given yesterday, Mr. EATON asked leave to introduce a bill "to amend the act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to carry into effect the ninth article of the Treaty with Spain.'" Leave was accordingly granted—the bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill "supplementary to an act, entitled An act to incorporate the Columbia Turnpike Company, into the District of Columbia." Mr. KING, of Alabama, was called to the Chair. This bill gives the company the power to raise its tolls. Some remarks were made upon it, by Messrs. CHANDLER, and LLOYD of Maryland. It was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill reported by the Committee on the Militia, "more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States, and providing for the discipline thereof" was taken up for consideration; and, on motion of Mr. KNIGHT, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the House of Representatives "to provide for the necessary surveys for roads and canals," was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. The question was, upon adopting an amendment heretofore proposed by Mr. BENTON. Mr. B. not being present, the bill, upon motion of Mr. EATON, was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, "for the relief of Colonel William Duane," was next taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky explained the grounds upon which the committee reported this bill. It proposes to pay Colonel Duane the difference between the selling price of one thousand copies of his Cavalry System of Discipline, which the Government contracted to purchase of him, and the price at which they were sold at auction. It further provides for the repayment of five hundred dollars, advanced by Colonel Duane, for the Government.

Some discussion took place, in which Messrs. CHANDLER, SMITH, JACKSON, FINDLAY, JOHNSON of Kentucky, and LANMAN, engaged. A motion, by Mr. FINDLAY, to lay the bill on the table, was lost. Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the bill, by striking out so much as proposes to pay for the "System of Cavalry Discipline." Mr. LOWRIE opposed the amendment—it was lost. The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and passed to be engrossed and read the third time.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the Senate then took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, "concerning invalid pensioners." The bill provides for the payment of pensions to thirteen different persons. The Committee on Pensions, of the Senate, to whom the bill was referred, propose to amend it, by striking out the provision for seven of these persons. Mr. NOBLE explained the reasons for this amendment. It was then agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed and read a third time.

On motion of Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the petition of Ann Dubourg, presented at the last session, was again referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, unfavorable to the petition of Thomas Johnson, was again read for consideration. This petitioner, formerly a purser in the Navy of the United States, prays for the appropriation of the proceeds of certain prizes taken by the United States squadron in the Mediterranean, in the year 1805. The report of the committee was concurred in.

DUTY ON IMPORTS.

The bill from the other House, "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports," was taken up for a second reading. Mr. BRANCH, after a few remarks, expressing his opinion that the present was a proper time to try whether or not the Senate was willing to take this bill into consideration at all, moved that it should be indefinitely postponed. This motion gave rise to some cursory remarks upon the point of order. The Chair decided that, as the Senate had already passed the bill to a second reading, the motion of the honorable member from North Carolina was not in order until that reading had taken place. The bill was then read.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, said that he wished very much to ascertain what would be the effect of this measure, upon the revenue of the country; the importance of the subject was so evident, that it needed no comment from him; he thought it would have a powerful effect upon the finances of the country; and with a view to ascertain what the extent of that effect would be, he moved the reference of the bill to the Committee on Finance. This motion gave rise to a considerable discussion, as to the propriety of this reference. By the opponents of the motion, it was contended that the subject properly belonged to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures. Messrs. LLOYD of Maryland, MILLS, TAYLOR of Virginia, and SMITH, supported the motion; and Messrs. DICKERSON, JOHNSON of Kentucky, NOBLE, and CHANDLER, opposed it. Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, made some remarks upon the subject. The question was then taken, and decided against the reference to the Committee on Finance, by yeas and nays, as follows:

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the bill was then referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. MILLS then moved that the Committee on Finance be associated with the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, for the consideration of the bill "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports;" and that the members of both those committees be considered as one committee, for that purpose. This motion lies over for consideration.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, after commenting forcibly upon the momentous importance of this bill, than which none more important had been presented to the Senate, since the adoption of the Constitution, moved that two members, to be chosen by ballot, should be added to the Committee on Manufactures, for the consideration of the tariff bill.

The CHAIR stated that the motion, as it involved the alteration of the rule of the Senate, by which it is provided that the committee shall consist of five members, could not be put, by general consent. It was objected to, and was not put to the Senate.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, "to provide for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States," was then taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported to the Senate. Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke in favor of the bill; Mr. VAN BUREN moved its indefinite postponement, and made a few remarks in favor of that motion. Mr. LANMAN, also, advocated the postponement; and Mr. BARBOUR opposed it. The question was then put, and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Edwards, Findlay, Gaillard, King of Alabama, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Ruggles, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Brown, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, J. S. Johnston, Kelly, King of New York, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Palmer, Parrott, Smith, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, and Van Dyke.

The amendment made in Committee of the Whole, limiting the amount of any claim to three thousand dollars, was objected to by Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana. The amendments, however, were all agreed to. Mr. LOWRIE advanced some objections to the bill; to which Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, replied.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to amend the bill, by inserting a provision, that no claim of more than — years' standing shall be entitled to the benefits of this act, nor any claim which has been rejected by either House of Congress. On motion of Mr. JACKSON, the blank was filled with "twelve." The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HAYNE moved a new section, to give the Congress the power of revising any judgment or decree rendered under this act. The amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken, on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read the third time, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Branch, Brown, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, J. S. Johnston, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, McIlvaine, Macon, Smith, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, and Van Dyke.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Gaillard, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren, and Williams.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to repeal, in part, the act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Alabama Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States," together with the motion to recommit the same, with instructions; and, on motion, the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

And the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 21.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the President of the Washington Canal Company, with a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the company for the last year; which was read.

Mr. EDWARDS presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, in Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of an act imposing additional duties on imports; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, the Committee on the District of Columbia were discharged from the consideration of the memorial of the judges of the orphans' court in the District of Columbia; and, also, from the consideration of the memorial and counter-memorial of the inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, on the subject of retrocession of that part of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitted the memorial of Rezin Rawlings and John Locke, executors of Daniel Rawlings, made a further report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

lege, in the District of Columbia; and the bill for the relief of John H. Howland, of New York, were severally read the second time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee to join such committee as the Senate may appoint, to consider and report what business ought to be acted upon at the present session; and, also, at what time the session may be closed by the adjournment of the two Houses; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution last brought up for concurrence, and concurred therein, and Messrs. JACKSON, JOHNSON of Kentucky, and KELLY, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HAYNE, directing the Secretary of War "to report to the Senate the number of arms furnished by the State of South Carolina to the United States during the late war, and which have been substantiated at the proper department; and, also, whether any arrangements have been made for the settlement of the demand of the State for such arms, and what legal provisions may be necessary to carry the same into effect," was again read for consideration. Mr. H. briefly explained the objects of the resolution, and it was then agreed to.

The bill from the House of Representatives "concerning invalid pensions," was read the third time, as amended; the bill was then passed, and sent to the other House for concurrence in the amendment.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, "explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile," was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. BARBOUR in the Chair. Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved to amend the bill, by adding a proviso, "that no such claim shall be confirmed, if the quantity of land exceeds one acre." This amendment was agreed to. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed to be engrossed, and read the third time.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MILLS, proposing "that the Committee on Finance should be associated with the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, for the consideration of the bill "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports," and that the members of the two committees be considered as one committee for that purpose," was then read for consideration. Mr. MILLS made a few remarks in support of his motion. Messrs. BARBOUR, SMITH, and LLOYD of Massachusetts, also spoke in favor of it; and Messrs. DICKERSON, NOBLE, and LOWRIE, opposed it.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all but the word "Resolved," and inserting the following, "that the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire what effect the bill from the other House, 'to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports,' will have on the revenue of the country."

Messrs. KING of Alabama, JOHNSON of Kentucky, and ELLIOTT, opposed both the resolution and the amendment. The question was then taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative; and Mr. MILLS then withdrew his resolution.

COLONEL DUANE.

The bill for the relief of Colonel William Duane was read the third time. On the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Benton, Brown, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Gailard, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, Josiah S. Johnston, Kelly, Knight, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Mills, Ruggles, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Van Buren, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clayton, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, Macon, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke, and Ware.

So it was resolved, that this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act for the relief of Colonel William Duane."

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The bill from the House of Representatives, "to provide for making surveys for roads and canals," was then taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole. The question was upon an entire new bill, offered as an amendment, by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. BENTON rose and said, he would compare the provisions of the bill from the House of Representatives, with the provisions of the amendment which he had submitted, and he would state the reasons which induced him to prefer the amendment to the bill.

The bill is general. It places $30,000 in the hands of the President, and leaves him at liberty to select such routes for roads and canals as he shall think proper. It contains no details, neither as to the construction of the roads, nor as to the depth and width of the canals. It contains no limitation upon the number of persons to be employed in the survey, nor upon the wages to be allowed them. It asks no consent from the States to the execution of the works proposed to be undertaken within their limits.

The amendment is specific. It places the same thirty thousand dollars in the hands of the President, but specifies the routes to which he shall apply it. It defines the extent and capacity of the intended works. It limits the number of surveyors to be employed, and fixes their compensation. It asks the consent of the States to the execution of the works.

On this proposition to amend, Mr. B. did not consider the field to be open for debate on the constitutionality or general expediency of internal improvements. He considered the debateable ground to lie between the bill and the amendment.

Their comparative merits was the object of inquiry. He would limit himself to it, and endeavor to show,

1st. That it is better to adopt the specific than the general provisions.

2d. That the routes specified are national.

3d. That we have the funds to execute them.

On the first point.—The adoption of the bill, with the general provisions, would subject the President to a labor which ought not to be thrown upon him. He is an Executive officer, created for great national purposes, and his duties are defined in the Constitution. I do not deny but that the Congress may add to them, but it ought never to be done, except in a case of clear necessity, and here is no necessity at all. It is a deception practised upon itself, for the Congress to suppose that the talent and character of the President is to be embarked in those legislative duties annually assigned to him. He has enough to do under the Constitution. He cannot quit the great concerns of the nation to superintend these subaltern affairs. They are devolved upon some subordinate officer, we know not whom, and the errors and mistakes of the unknown deputy, are sanctified by the adoption of his august superior.

It is wrong to throw upon the President the responsibility of making these selections. They interest the local feelings of every part of the Union, and every section will claim its road or canal. If disappointed, it will be discontented, and nine-tenths of the applicants must be disappointed. No human being can decide upon their jarring pretensions, and give a general satisfaction. We cannot do it ourselves, though drawn from every part of the Union. The moment we begin to touch the internal improvement fund, we take the attitude of legatees, dividing the estate of an ancestor. Each goes for himself. How stands the question at this moment in the Senate? We have one proposition to divide the fund according to the population of the States; another to divide according to the rule of laying direct taxes; a third to divide according to the superficial content of the States; and each State goes for that by which it would gain most. The amendment which I have submitted adopts a rule of division different from all these: it proposes to apply the fund nationally, to make roads and canals where the national interest requires them, without regard to population, direct taxes, or the size of the States. The Congress can agree upon neither, and it throws the responsibility of division upon the President. What will be the result? Why, the President will order some routes to be surveyed, and when the surveys are brought in, and an appropriation is demanded, all the disappointed may stand together, attack his selection, and defeat it.

It was wrong to give to the President a legislative duty to perform. The selection of these routes is a legislative function. It involves appropriations and local interests, and may give great advantages to one part of the Union over another. Seventeen years ago, it was said by one of our most eminent statesmen, that, "the National Legislature alone, embracing every local interest, and superior to every local consideration, is competent to the selection of such national objects." (Gallatin on Roads and Canals.)

It is wrong to give to the Executive the vast increase of patronage which the general provisions of this bill will confer upon him. It was said in England, thirty years ago, that the power of the Crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished. The same may be said of the patronage of the American Executive; and shall we, instead of diminishing, add to it, some twenty or thirty millions more? Shall we refuse to sit here and vote upon these routes, in our characters of Senators, and then rush to the President, and, in the supplicant posture of petitioners, humbly sue to him for a division of the spoil?

The adoption of the amendment will prevent all these evils, will save the President from a labor to which he ought not to be subjected—from a responsibility to which he ought not to be exposed—from a legislative duty which does not belong to him—from an increase of patronage which may bring the members of the National Legislature, in crowds, to his feet.

The amendment asks for the consent of the States. The request does not turn upon the notion that the act of one State can give a power to Congress which it has not derived from the Constitution. It turns upon the question of trespass upon the soil and jurisdiction of a sovereign State. The right of Congress to appropriate the money, is generally admitted. The great objection is to the right of the Federal Government to enter the limits of a sovereign State, and dig up its soil, cut down its trees, and trample upon its grass. This involves the idea of trespass upon the soil and jurisdiction of the State; and that presents a question limited to the two parties concerned. If the State is sovereign, she can consent to the entry, and waive the supposed trespass; if she is not, there can be no violation of sovereignty in entering without it. Granting the right of Congress to be clearly inferrible from the Constitution, I would still prefer to make these improvements with the consent of the States. It would be respectful towards them to ask their consent. It would conform to the opinion of some distinguished statesmen.* It would follow the principle of the act under which the Cumberland road was opened; an act which had the approbation of Mr. Jefferson, and which procured the assent of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, to the construction of that great road within their respective limits. It cannot be presumed that a State would refuse its consent in any case in which it would be beneficial to itself to grant it, or that the Congress would wish to open a road or a canal contrary to the will and the interest of the State through which it would pass. The request will not compromise any existing right. I can see no possible evil; on the contrary, great advantages from making the request.

The routes specified in the amendment are national. They are—

For Canals.

1. A route to connect the inland tide waters, along the Atlantic coast, from Maine to Florida.
2. A route to connect the Ohio and Potomac rivers.
3. A route to connect the Ohio and Lake Erie.
4. A route to connect the Illinois and Lake Michigan.
5. A route to connect the Tennessee river with the waters of the Mobile bay.
6. A route to connect the inland tide waters along the Gulf coast, from the Mississippi to the Atlantic Ocean.

For Roads.

1. From Washington City, south, to Florida.
2. From Washington City, north, to Maine.
3. From Washington City, southwest, through Virginia and Tennessee.
4. From Washington City, northwest, in completion of the Cumberland road, to Missouri.
5. From New Orleans to Columbus, in Ohio.

These objects announce themselves as national. They follow the course of travelling, of trade, of the mails, of the march of troops, and they unite the grand geographical divisions of the country.

1. The canal along the Atlantic coast was projected by Mr. Gallatin, in the year 1807. The inland tide waters, in front of that extended coast, are only separated by some half a dozen necks of land, making in the whole one hundred miles. Canals of eight feet depth, opened across these necks, would give an inland navigation of one thousand six hundred miles, secure from storms and enemies. Steamboats of the largest size, and all the common sea vessels, could float upon it. The communication between all the Atlantic seaports would be safe, regular, and rapid, as well in bad as in good weather, in war as in peace. 2. The project of a canal between the Ohio and Potomac has too recently occupied the public attention to need a word of commendation from me. 3. The junction of the Ohio and Lake Erie was a favorite object with General Washington, and now engages the anxious deliberations of the States interested in it. Nature seems to have intended these waters for communion. In various places, in the States of Ohio and Indiana, they approach and almost embrace each other. The Wabash, Scioto, and Muskingum approximate to the opposite streams of the lake, and call upon man to join them together. 3. Between the Illinois and Lake Michigan the effort of nature has been greater, the work of man will be less, and the result more grand and universal. The Pass at Chicago is the Dardanelles of North America. A cut of a few miles would unite the inland seas of the North, the Lakes Superior, Huron, Erie, and Michigan, with the fifty thousand miles of river navigation which traverse the valley of the Mississippi. 5. The junction of the Tennessee with the waters of the Mobile would unite two large divisions of the country, and give facilities to the commerce of four different States. With all these objects, the public mind had been long familiar, and eulogies upon their advantages would be labor misplaced, in the American Senate. The route along the Gulf is the only one which presents itself in the shape of a new project, and some details upon its practicability and advantages ought to be given. Mr. BENTON would give them, partly from his own observation, but chiefly from a fund of accurate information received from the intelligent delegate from Florida, General CALL.

The direction of this route would be East and West; its point of commencement, in the Iberville river, on the Mississippi; its termination in the St. John's river, on the Atlantic coast; the Iberville is an arm of the Mississippi; breaking out from the main river about one hundred miles above New Orleans, and discharging itself into Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain. At nine miles from the Mississippi it meets the tide! The St. John's is a noble river of East Florida, twelve feet deep on the bar at its mouth, and navigable for ships two hundred miles.

The route divides itself into four stages:

1. From the Mississippi to Mobile bay, three hundred and sixty miles.
2. From Mobile bay to Pensacola, forty miles.
3. From Pensacola to the bay of St. Mark's, two hundred and fifty miles.
4. From St. Mark's to the tide in St. John's river, two hundred miles.

The first stage lies through the Iberville, the Lakes Maurepas, Pontchartrain, and Borgne, and behind the range of islands which lie in front of the coast. The work to be done upon this part of the route is next to nothing. Some rafts only, which obstruct the channel of the Iberville, are to be removed.

The second stage, from Mobile bay to Pensacola. The route lies through the river Bonne Secourre, over land, five miles, to an arm of the Perdido bay, and from the Perdido, over land, one mile, to the grand lagoon which communicates with the bay of Pensacola. The work to be done upon this stage is to open two canals, one of five miles, the other of one mile, in length.

The third stage, from Pensacola to St. Mark's. The route follows the coast, behind the island Santa Rosa, to the bay of Choctawhatchy, thence up a large bayou into the bay of St. Andrew's, thence five miles, over land, to Lake Wimeco, which communicates with the bay of St. Mark's. The only work to be done is to open a canal of five miles, between the bay of St. Andrew's and the Lake Wimeco.

The fourth stage, between the Bay of St. Mark's and the tide-water of St. John's river. The route is along the coast sixty miles, to the mouth of Suwaney river, up to its eastern point of navigation, and over land, twenty miles, to the river St. John's. The work to be done, to open a canal twenty miles, between the Suwaney and St. John's, through a level country and a light soil, reposing upon a clay foundation. It is worthy of remark, that, between the Suwaney and the Atlantic ocean, there are two means of communication, both equally short and easy—by the St. John's and St. Mary's. In favor of the latter route, a memorial now lies upon the table of the Senate, from the citizens of the southern parts of Georgia, praying a canal to be opened, and stating the distance at twenty-five miles.

Mr. B. called the attention of the Senate to the inconsiderable work required to be done, and the great effect to be produced in opening the route which he had traced. The removal of some rafts of timber in the Iberville, would open a communication between the Mississippi and the Mobile bay; two canals of six miles would unite the bays of Mobile, Perdido, and Pensacola; a canal of five miles would unite the bays of Pensacola, St. Andrew's, and St. Mark's; and a canal of twenty miles would cut through the peninsula of Florida, and unite the Gulf of Mexico with the Atlantic ocean. He dwelt upon the advantages of completing this communication, which nature had indicated, between the Mississippi and the Atlantic. It would diminish the distance two thousand miles. It would be safe from pirates and storms, from the fleets of enemies, and from the power which may hold the Havana. It would enable the produce of the valley of the Mississippi to distribute itself along the Gulf coast and to penetrate the interior of all the Southern States.

The same barge or steamboat which had issued from the Ohio, the Upper Mississippi, or Missouri, instead of being confined to the single market at New Orleans, would have that market and a hundred others open to it. The Iberville would carry the trader to New Orleans, by the lake Pontchartrain, or enable him to penetrate the interior of the State of Mississippi, by turning up the Amite, the Pearl, and the Pascagoula rivers. He might go to Mobile, and thence into the heart of the State of Alabama, by the Tombigbee and Alabama rivers, or to Pensacola and St. Mark's, and enter Georgia upon the west, through the Appalachicola and Flint rivers; or, continuing his course across the peninsula of Florida, he might turn up the Atlantic coast, touch at Savannah and Charleston, and reach the interior of Georgia and South Carolina by the several rivers which flow from them. The advantages of such multiplied markets would be reciprocally beneficial. The valley of the Mississippi is agricultural; the Southern States are planting. The surplus flour, beef, pork, and whiskey, which lies at New Orleans, almost without price and without demand, would find markets at Mobile, Pensacola, St. Mark's, St. Augustine, Charleston, Savannah, and at the innumerable towns and cotton plantations which cover the banks of the rivers in the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina, and the Territory of Florida.

The advantage of an inland communication between the Mississippi and Atlantic, did not escape the observation of Mr. Gallatin, in his great plan for roads and canals in the year 1807. At that time, the Floridas did not belong to the United States.

The route along the coast could not be contemplated. Mr. Gallatin could only look to the country above the 31st degree of north latitude, and in that region he indicated a canal to be opened, five hundred and fifty miles in length, at the expense of thirty millions of dollars, and ten years of labor. Great as would be the labor and expense of such an undertaking, Mr. Gallatin was of opinion that the commercial, and other advantages, of discharging the Mississippi into the Atlantic ocean, through the intermediate territory and State of Georgia, would be worth it all. (Page 41 of his report.) But now, by the acquisition of the Floridas, a new route presents itself, requiring but thirty-one miles of canals to complete it! the work of one Summer! and the expenditure of less than one quarter of a million!

Upon the subject of the roads, which his amendment specified, Mr. B. would be brief. Their number and direction had been stated. Issuing from the doors of the Capitol, four of them would proceed to the four grand divisions of the Republic. The fifth, traversing the valley of the Mississippi, from north to south, would pass through the centre of the intermediate States, intersecting the great southwest road in Tennessee, and the great northwest road in the State of Ohio. Each of them combines the characteristics of national highways. They followed the direction of travelling, whether for business or pleasure—the direction of the great mails, and the lines upon which troops would be marched for the defence of the country.

3. Have we the money to execute this great system of internal improvement?

Mr. B. thought that the funds were forthcoming. It would have been idle to put the Senate upon an inquiry into the propriety of adopting this great system, if, in the event of its adoption, we should have no money to carry it into effect. He had considered that part of the subject before he had submitted any plan, and he saw, or thought he saw, two distinct sources from which the funds would be derived. First, from the lapse of different appropriations now applicable to objects which would soon cease to require them. Under this head came the sums appropriated for paying Revolutionary pensioners, for completing the fortifications, and finishing the public buildings. The pension list now required $1,290,000, the fortifications $600,000, the public buildings $100,000. The pension fund had diminished more than one-half in the last three years, and must entirely cease in a very short time, from the deaths of the pensioners. The expenditure for fortifications and public buildings must cease in a few years, from the completion of the works. From the lapse of these three items of annual appropriations, the sum of two millions of dollars will soon be disengaged from their present objects, and applicable to such new purposes as the Congress may determine. The second source from which the necessary funds may be derived is, from the increased revenue from the customs. It is the theory of economists, that consumption and population increase together. In the United States this theory has been more than realized. In 1790 our population was four millions, our revenues from customs four and a half; in 1823 the population is eleven millions, the duties from customs seventeen; the revenue is quadrupled, the population not quite trebled. The present revenue is more than enough for the current expenses of the year; the annual increase must therefore be a surplus, applicable to new objects of expenditure. This, without the benefit of the new tariff; but, under the operation of the increased duties, it is admitted on all hands that the revenue must be increased upwards of two millions per annum.

Here, then, are ample funds for carrying on the great works indicated in the amendment. Admit that they shall require twenty-five or thirty millions, yet they are not to be completed in a year, and the amount will not be required at once. An annual appropriation of two or three millions, distributed in due proportions among the different works, would complete them all in some ten or fifteen years. We should then have all the grand divisions of the Republic united and bound together by great leading roads and canals, made at the national expense. The State governments might complete the system, by executing smaller works at their own expense. When completed, the whole would redound to the benefit of all parts of the country, and of every individual of the community. Roads and canals are objects of universal use and convenience. They belong to that class of benefits which it is the noblest ambition of the statesman to bestow upon his country. The most eminent conquerors have deemed their glory incomplete, unless crowned with the merit of these beneficent works. The great Napoleon, when giving the law to Europe, was also engaged in digging canals and opening roads through the interior of France. Cæsar, when triumphant over all enemies, gave orders to drain the Pontine marshes, to cut through the isthmus of Corinth, to dig harbors on the coasts of Italy, and to open roads across the Appenine mountains.

Our great WASHINGTON, in all the situations of his life, when a young man in the Colonial Legislature, when President, when again retired to private station, was a constant advocate for internal improvements. To us, who are mere legislators, whose peculiar duty it is to apply the public money, I can see no higher object of ambition than that of applying it in a way so universally advantageous to the whole body of the people.

When Mr. B. had concluded—

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, addressed the Senate, in opposition to the proposed amendment, and in favor of the original bill.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I am opposed both to the bill and the amendment. The first describes the character of the roads, but keeps out of view their designation and extent; the other designates the roads and canals contemplated, but is careful not to define their character, nor to indicate the source from whence the power is derived. Still, I admire the frankness of the mover of the amendment. He shows you at once the extent of his plan; a plan as magnanimous as it is magnificent, and as extravagant, as impracticable. Still, I should have been better pleased, if the advocates of internal improvement would have selected the part of the Constitution that gives them the power. This, they have carefully and prudently avoided. Prudently indeed, for should any one source be selected, my life for it, not one-fourth of either House would concur. Yet this subject presents this singular inconsistency: that a power which must be derived from some one grant in the Constitution, can unite but a small minority as to the source from whence it is derived, but yet, will I fear, unite a majority in favor of its existence.

One tells us, that it is to be found in the grant to "regulate commerce;" another, from the consent of the States; a third, from the right to "erect needful buildings;" a fourth, from the military power; a fifth, from "common defence, and general welfare;" others, from other sources; and some, from all combined.

Now, sir, these differences as to the source of the power, might well induce a doubt of its existence.

Implied, or incidental powers, were once fashionable doctrines. It was insisted, that they were necessary, and that, without them, those granted could not be executed. The position has been too willingly yielded, and, once yielded, these powers may be claimed to an unlimited extent. Now, sir, I deny that any of these are necessary to the execution of any of the defined and enumerated powers in the Constitution. There are, to be sure, subordinate, suppletory, or auxiliary powers—Congress may pass all laws "necessary and proper" to carry into effect those defined and prescribed in the Constitution. But, these are expressly granted; and this clause in the Constitution, applies to every grant. Congress has power "to lay and collect taxes," &c., and "to pass all laws necessary and proper" for this purpose. Take the most naked grant in the Constitution, and, with this auxiliary power, you can do all you ought, without the aid of implication, Constitution, or incident.

Full well I know, that this is not the doctrine of the day. Power never retrogrades—it is always progressive. In 1800, these doctrines of constructive, implied, incidental, or resulting powers were spreading, and advancing to a consummation, by some devoutly wished, when they were checked by a political revolution. Ever since, they have been progressive, even among the disciples of the Democratic school, until at this time principles are urged and powers claimed, which even Mr. Hamilton never pretended, but denied, could be derived from the Constitution.

In 1810, I think, there was an attempt to renew the charter of the old bank. A bill was reported, and ably defended, by a distinguished Senator from Georgia, who was, I believe, the chairman of the committee. It was opposed by a distinguished member from Virginia, in an ingenious and eloquent, but very singular and extraordinary speech. A member from Kentucky, who now stands pre-eminent as the advocate of broad and liberal constructions of the Constitution, then combatted, with great ability, severity, and sarcasm, these dangerous, unconstitutional principles. This eminent statesman opposed the construction which gave you a bank, but admits that for roads and canals.

Another, a citizen of Virginia too, who has since been exalted to the head of the nation, at last, yielded to the progress of opinion—admitted the constitutionality of the bank, but would not sign a bill which provided an unconstitutional bonus, for “roads and canals.”

The power for both, if it exists, must be derived from the same source; and yet, here are two eminent statesmen, one admitting that you have the power to establish a bank, but denying you that for roads and canals; the other denying the former, but admitting the latter. It is possible, however, that by this time, these gentlemen have both found some nook or corner in the Constitution whence they can derive the power to do both.

Were these gentlemen here, who formed the Constitution, I might with confidence appeal to them, if it had been believed that it contained the power claimed by this bill, whether it could possibly have been adopted? No, sir, the truth is, this doctrine carries us much further than we ever went before; and one class of politicians, I mean the Federalists, have a right to hold their heads high. When one nation or people conquer another, and settle down in their country, it not unfrequently happens, that the conquerors adopt the laws, manners, customs, and creed of the vanquished—especially if the latter have the most intelligence and civilization. I trust this was not the case in the victory of 1800; but it some way or other happens, that we have not only adopted the strongest Federal maxims, but have gone much further. And if we establish the principle proposed in this bill, that party may congratulate themselves, that, though their power has been lost, their principles have in this instance triumphed.

But I conjure gentlemen to reflect, that, when the act is passed, and in the hands of the judiciary, it will be then beyond our reach. The Supreme Court will not inquire of us whence we derived the power, nor what is its character. Indeed, as so few who claim it can agree whence they derive it, such an inquiry would be utterly fruitless. They will take the law and the Constitution, and, if they in their wisdom see fit, they will tell you that the right in Congress to construct roads and canals is derived from the power “to regulate commerce;” that the original power is exclusive, and so is the derivative: that, therefore, the consent of a State is unnecessary, and consequently the resistance of a State could have no effect. If they should so determine, it will result, that roads and canals might be cut and carried any where through a State, against its interests, and in defiance of its authority.

In such an event I ask, where is your remedy? The law is passed, the canals and roads are made, the property is vested, the die is cast. My friends from the West are aware that such has been the effect in regard to the United States Bank. Congress has power, say the court, to regulate commerce, and to collect a revenue. These powers are exclusive. To facilitate their fiscal concerns, it is “necessary and proper” to appoint persons to receive, and places to deposite, their money. These receivers or bankers may be authorized not only to manage the money of the Government, but their own. Wherefore, Congress can establish a bank, with a capital of thirty-five millions; extend its branches into every State of the Union, and protect it in the exercise of its functions, in spite of State authority. Would not the same process of reasoning authorize them to do the same in regard to roads and canals? My life for it, pass the law, admit the power, and your judicial courts would not, in enforcing it, be limited by considerations of the consent or refusal of a State. They would, as many in Congress now do, seize hold on the power to regulate commerce, tell you that it is an exclusive power, and that their complaints and remonstrances will be vain, let the injury be what it may.

Where, then, I repeat, is your remedy? Will you repeal the law? As in the case of the bank, the power will have been exercised, the right vested, and the sovereignty of a State infringed. Do you hope relief from the House of Representatives? They are the national branch of the Legislature, and are becoming every day more national. Do you hope any thing from the Executive? A President grasps at power, as he continues in office. Mr. Monroe, at the commencement of his Administration, anticipating that this subject would be attempted in Congress, rather prematurely, as was thought, forestalled them, and gave them to understand that, if they passed a bill, he should be compelled to arrest it by his negative. He has since, it seems, abandoned all his scruples, and very lately admitted the power to exist. Are you to look for redress for an encroachment on State rights to the judicial tribunals? The nature of man, as well as past experience, assure us that here you would forever be disappointed. Who, then, are the legitimate guardians of the States? This Senate. To this end were we constituted; to this purpose it is our duty to act.

In discussing this bill and the amendment, I shall present two questions to the consideration of the Senate. Is it clear, that, by the Constitution, you have the power to pass the bill? And if so, is it prudent at this time to exercise it? I am aware, sir, that the bill only proposes a survey—and this surely, cannot be unconstitutional. But is it intended to stop here? You will send your corps of engineers into the States, to designate for them such roads and canals as they may make. If the States are to make these roads and canals at last, they will not thank you for designating them; this they would do much better than you. No, sir, however disguised the bill may be, this is the entering wedge; the commencement of a grand scheme of internal improvement. And I call upon the advocates of this measure to point out to me the part of the Constitution which gives you this authority. Is it in that "to regulate commerce?" But to this there is a restriction, that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." Now, if constructing roads and canals is regulating commerce, then how can you execute this power, without giving this "preference?" You make a canal; it is a "regulation" of commerce; it is from a port or place in one State, to that of another; can you observe equality in all this, and treat all the States alike? The local situation, and nature of the ground, render this impracticable. If then, it is to be derived from the power over commerce, this limitation meets you at the threshold, and renders the whole scheme utterly impossible. But how is it, that we give this word "regulate," this originating power, and make it read, to "erect, create, construct?" I have always understood that its meaning was directory or prescriptive. To "regulate commerce" is not to create it, but to prescribe rules by which it is to be managed. "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States," &c. Here Congress is the agent, regulation is the action, and the States are the objects. The rules are to operate upon them. The literal meaning of the word is, "to set in order by rule or method." Could the framers of the Constitution have ever supposed that this plain, simple, unequivocal word would have been perverted to authorize the construction of roads and canals? But give this word "regulate" this creative power, and where are we to stop? If a road is a means or medium of commerce, money is emphatically so. If you can make the one, you can the other. As you are not, as the States are, restrained from issuing bills of credit, you might regulate commerce by making paper money; and as this power over commerce is an exclusive power, this money might be made a legal tender, and forced upon the people, and even a local or State bank which stood in its way might be suppressed.

Indeed, upon this construction, I do not perceive why you may not carry on the commerce in those channels which you create. And if you can do this, why not take the whole coasting trade, or even the foreign trade, into your own hands? Sir, give this little word the construction contended for, and there is no limit by which you are to be restrained.

But, it is said this word has had a practical legislative construction, which will warrant you to use it to construct roads and canals. Congress have, under this power over commerce, created and built lighthouses and piers. As this position does not prove what the Constitution is, but what it is construed to be, it will be enough for my purpose to show that Congress never have built lighthouses or piers under the authority to regulate commerce. Congress has power to erect forts, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings, on lands purchased with the consent of the State where the land is. Lighthouses were erected before the Constitution was adopted, and in the first session of the First Congress an act passed providing for, and requiring of the States a cession of the jurisdiction, hereby admitting that they claimed the power under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes the "erection of needful buildings." Congress has ever since, either by special or general provisions, required that, before the lighthouse or pier should be erected, the jurisdiction of the site should be ceded to the United States. Congress, then, have never so expounded the Constitution as "to erect or create," under the grant "to regulate commerce." As we have designated the power whereby we create these "buildings," now let us see if the friends of roads and canals can derive theirs from the same source. Congress has power to create needful buildings: roads and canals are needful buildings: therefore, Congress has power to create and build roads and canals. Let us try the strength of this syllogism, and illustrate the argument by bringing in a bill to make a canal, and taking the words of the Constitution for the title of the act: "An act for the creation of Needful Buildings—Be it enacted, &c. That there shall be erected and built a canal, to be ten feet deep and ten rods wide, to commence at the river St. Mary's, in the State of Georgia, and to pass through the maritime frontier of the United States to the river St. Croix, in the State of Maine, and for this purpose there be appropriated two hundred millions of dollars, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated." Sir, such an act, with such a title would be the subject of universal ridicule; and yet, this act, with this title, is a fair illustration of the whole argument. But, if gentlemen are driven from one fortress, they retreat to another. And if I mistake not, I witnessed an honorable gentleman intrenching at Gridley's farm—a purchase of property by the United States without the consent of the State. If the right exists, will it not help you to roads and canals? As to this right in Congress to purchase lands, I am inclined to differ, which I do always with deference and reluctance, from my venerable friend from Virginia, (Mr. TAYLOR.) The United States may hold lands, but not to an unlimited extent. Before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, we had acquired the Northwestern territory by cessions from several States; and had, by the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, provided for its government, and stipulated for its admission into the Union. The lands were to be applied to the payment of the Revolutionary debt. It was then foreseen that, from necessity, we must, at a future day, hold these lands within the limits of a sovereign State. It was, moreover, perceived that we might acquire other territory by treaty. The Constitution consequently provided that, by these operations "nothing should be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State." By this precaution, the interest of the United States and the sovereignty of the individual States are equally secured.

The power to raise and disburse money, and to dispose of lands, renders it indispensable that you should have debtors, and therefore a power to enforce payment of debts. If a man neglects or refuses to pay his debts or taxes, you can take his goods or lands, and appropriate them to the payment. In one other way, and one only, can you hold lands, and that is by purchase. But this is also expressly limited and defined. After providing for a district for the Seat of Government, Congress can exercise exclusive legislation "over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings." Here, while the right to purchase is given, it is limited to specific objects or purposes. You may, I believe, purchase for these objects, thus defined, without the consent of a State, but can exercise no legislation, and the places would be, in your hands, subject to the laws of the State, as other property. The purchase is to be confined to the object, and the consent of the State gives you exclusive legislation over the purchase. These are the three, and the only methods by which you can hold lands within the limits of a State. By acquisition of territory, by debts and taxes, and by purchase for specified objects. These means to acquire national domain are sufficiently ample for all useful purposes, and quite too ample for the security of the independence and sovereignty of the States. You have not, you ought never to have, the power to purchase lands in a State for roads, canals, or any other national project. And, if you would thus purchase, where would be the benefit? The laws of the States would control and embarrass you. Their regulations might subject you to different and perplexing impositions and burdens. Such property would be a source of vexation and expense, and would be worse than useless.

But it is proposed that, if there is any deficiency of power, the States may supply it by cession.

I know of but one way in which the political power of a State can be surrendered; it is by an amendment of the Constitution. The powers of the States, as such, must all be equal. What portion of power has been retained by the people, and what given up to their Legislature, is a question for each State to determine for itself, but any inequality in the Constitution of a State creates no inequality in the different States as political bodies. As such, they are on a perfect equality. The United States can exercise no power in one, which it cannot in another, without consent, and this consent can only be given where the Constitution allows it. The original States, which formed the Constitution, were equally sovereign and independent. Each gave up an equal portion of power to the United States, and consequently what was retained must be equal. Equality of power is essential to the existence of a State. It cannot have less than the rest, and when it has, it ceases to be a State.

Nothing is so essential to the harmony and perpetuity of the Union as this equality. If a State may surrender to the United States a portion of its sovereign power, why not the whole? Could this be done, Congress might have exclusive legislation over a Territory and population, to the great danger and annoyance of the rest of the States.

And, if a State may have less, why may it not have more, than its originally reserved powers? As this right to receive and surrender powers must be reciprocal, it seems to result that Congress, on the part of the United States, and the Legislature of a State, on the part of a State, may barter and exchange the people's rights as they please. And if this right of cession, or consent of a State, except where authorized by the Constitution, be once admitted, it might produce an inequality, variety, and contrariety of powers repugnant to the plan and design, and even subversive of the Constitution.

But, if a State has a right to surrender any of its legislative or sovereign powers, except where it is specially provided, have we any right to take it? How can Congress exercise that legislative power which should be so surrendered? The Constitution prescribes the limits of our legislation, and beyond that we cannot go. The cessions allowed are defined; consequently, all others are excluded.

The Constitution has allowed Congress to exercise certain powers by the consent of a State, and a State to exercise others by the consent of Congress. We are prohibited, by a general clause, to exercise the powers not granted either absolutely or conditionally, that is, with consent. The prohibitions upon the States, though more specific, are of the same character. No consent of Congress could authorize a State to coin money, emit bills of credit, or pass a tender law. These are absolute prohibitions. But a State may, with the consent of Congress, lay imposts on imports and exports, enter into compacts, and engage in war. Congress can, in certain defined cases, exercise exclusive legislation, with the consent of a State. Now, as a State cannot exercise any power by the consent of Congress, except it be allowed by the Constitution, neither can Congress, by the consent or cession of a State, except where it is so allowed. But, as the Constitution has given no power to a State to authorize us to make roads and canals, it would seem to follow that no such power can be derived from the consent of a State.

But how is a State to give its consent? It seems to be understood, by its Legislature. It would be impossible that an adequate cession, of sufficient width for a canal, could be made, without including not only the property of individuals, but their persons. The grant for the New York canal embraces territory on each side, for its convenience. Now, let me ask what right has the Legislature of a State to cede away or disfranchise a citizen? The great leading principles in Magna Charta are embraced in most if not all our State constitutions. No citizen is to be put out of the protection of the law, or despoiled of his immunities or privileges, but by the judgment of his peers, or the laws of the land. How, then, could the Legislature of a State assign one of its citizens to the United States without impugning these great maxims of freedom? It would be a disfranchisement without judgment or law. It would be a bill of pains and penalties, robbing a man of his citizenship without his consent, or even his knowledge.

Sir, these are no new doctrines. In the unpleasant contest of the admission of Missouri into the Union, I then contended that no State could yield up a part of her sovereign power as a condition of her admission; that every State must be received on the footing of perfect equality. I did not anticipate that my friends from Missouri would so soon have abandoned these principles.

The bill before us proposes this survey for military as well as other roads, and this renders it necessary to inquire whether the authority to construct roads and canals can be derived from the military or war-making power.

This part of the subject I approach with great deference and humility—deference, because whatever is military, is, at this day, very popular; humility, because I see much evidence that the people are too much disposed to magnify this at the expense of civil right, which I fear is rapidly becoming subordinate to the military.

I admit that, in time of war, the civil power must, in some measure, be suspended; that, in the midst of arms, laws are in a degree silent; that, amidst blood and carnage, liberty retires, and weeps in silence. Armies must be marched, roads must be cut, farms and gardens must be subverted, houses demolished, breastworks thrown up, battles fought, men slain, wives, mothers, and daughters, bereaved. These are the antic tricks and freaks of the monster war; these are the scenes in which he riots; this is the food on which he delights to feed. But peace returns, and civil right is restored; injuries are repaired; wrongs are righted; and, although the slain cannot be resuscitated, their memories can be consecrated, and their relatives protected. It is then emphatically true that the military is subordinate to the civil authority—not a soldier could be quartered on a citizen without his consent—not a rod of ground can be subject to your power, without the consent of the State where it is.

Connected with, and consequent upon, this war-making power, is that of fortifications; and this has been seized on as giving an authority to construct roads and canals. You obtain the site for a fortification by purchase; you obtain the jurisdiction over it by the consent of the State. You can only purchase for this object—to this the Constitution limits you. Besides, no man can sell more than his own. An individual conveys to the United States a site for a fort; he may have, as appendant or appurtenant to it, a right of way. This is, and must be, limited to a communication with the first common high way, and there it ceases. This is all which, at most, he could convey; and, consequently, this is all you could purchase. Beyond this, the United States could acquire no right over the land of another.

Now, could the consent of a State alter or extend this right? This is necessary to give you exclusive legislation over the land so purchased.

This power of exclusive legislation is not a grant, but an authority to receive one from a State. It must be co-extensive and commensurate with, and consequent upon, the purchase; but the purchase is limited to the object, and the consent to the purchase; wherefore, the exclusive legislation is confined to the object, which is the fortification. Unless I am deceived by a partiality for my own reasoning, the argument on this point is conclusive. But even if the consent of a State to a purchase for a fort or arsenal could authorize a right of way from and to it, what may be its extent? From and to what place or places? Where is the terminus ad quem? Surely not beyond the limits of the State. A State cannot, any more than an individual, dispose of more than it has. One State cannot legislate for another; I never knew it attempted but once. I understood that the Legislature of Pennsylvania did undertake to pass a law regulating the sale of lands in Ohio, but Governor McKean returned it with his negative, sarcastically remarking, that perhaps it might be as well to leave it to the good people of Ohio to make their own laws in their own way. If, then, a road, as appurtenant to a fortification, might extend from it to the bounds of a State, it would be totally incomplete for your purpose—your object is to make a communication from one post to another. Your appurtenant road or canal could not exist except in the State where your fortification is established. Every other State through which you would carry it, would obstruct you, and the power being thus limited and restricted, would be worse than useless.

I know very well that we have been told that, without the right to make roads and canals, the military power will be imperfect. I hope in God that in this country the military power will always be imperfect. A perfect military power is a military despotism. Gentlemen seem to forget that there are yet some powers left to the States, and that they have corresponding duties. A fort is to be erected in a State, primarily for its protection, remotely as a defence of the Union. A State has important powers reserved, civil as well as military. It holds the purse and the sword, as well as the United States. It has nearly the exclusive control of its militia in peace, and an important direction of it in war. In this latter event, it can raise armies, and maintain navies. As a fort is established for the mutual benefit of the State and the United States, it was proper that each should contribute something to its establishment. The parties agree on the site, the State provides facilities of communication, either by its rivers or roads, or both, and cedes away its sovereignty, and the United States build, arm, man, and defend it; and by its exclusive legislation govern it, in their own way, and at their own expense.

And what more power do you need over your military posts or places? Do you still apprehend that this power is so incomplete that, in time of peace, the army may suffer? Do you fear that, if it has no other means of protection and sustenance than purchase of individuals or consent of States, that it may be in distress, without remedy, and, therefore, it is necessary to amplify the military power to provide against this imaginary evil? Sir, this is all visionary. We hail the soldier of liberty as a friend. When saw we him hungry, and gave him no meat; thirsty, and gave him no drink; naked, and clothed him not; sick and imprisoned, and did not administer unto him? These deeds of charity are done, not only to our own soldiers, but to prisoners and rebels. Our kindness to a captured or wounded enemy, both in the Revolutionary and late wars, was proverbial, and, I regret to add, was too often requited with base ingratitude. No, sir; when any portion of your army, in any part of the United States, shall be unable to obtain shelter or sustenance by ordinary means, that part of your country will be in that state of rebellion which would justify force, or the army itself will have become so odious that it is time it is disbanded.

Your bill, I perceive, contemplates the making of post roads. As the power to establish post offices and post roads has been seized on with much confidence, as authorizing you to make them where you please, it will be necessary to give this grant a particular examination, although I confess I could never perceive how a power to "establish" a road, could be deemed an authority to construct a canal. To come to a correct conclusion on this point, we have nothing to do but to take language in its usual and ordinary sense. The word "establish," as applied to this subject, was taken from the Articles of Confederation, in which a power was given to the United States "to establish and regulate post offices from one State to another, throughout the United States." The word occurs twice in the preamble, and three times in the body of the Constitution. It is, in every instance, prescriptive or directory. One of the objects of the Constitution, as mentioned in its preamble, is, to "establish justice," not to create it; but to prescribe the rule by which it is to be administered. For the purposes mentioned in the preamble, "We, the people, ordain and establish," that is, decree and prescribe, "this Constitution." The judicial power is vested in a supreme court, and such inferior tribunals as Congress shall "ordain and establish." Congress has power to "establish" uniform rules of naturalization, and to "establish" post offices. In all these, they prescribe rules and duties for others. With these instances before us, and these are all, let us now apply the word to post roads, and it is plain, that the intent must have been, not to construct, but to prescribe or designate. Had the Constitution intended to have given us the power which is contended for, it would have used a word, a monosyllable of four letters only, and all doubt would have been removed. The word "make" could never have been misunderstood. It is the ordinary statute word. The literal definition of establish is, to fix firmly, to settle; substitute this definition for the word itself, and read the clause, "Congress shall have power to fix and settle post roads," and no mortal would suspect that we had thereby the power to make them.

The ordinary meaning of the word, forbids the construction which is attempted. Were you to order your servant to "establish" a fire for you, he would stare at you with astonishment. Should you direct your tailor to "establish" for you a coat and pantaloons, surely he would not understand you, and be more likely to believe that you wished him to put them on, than to make them for you. You find, moreover, no statute, or legal use of this word, that will justify your construction. In the old English statutes for constructing highways, the words are "lay and make," or "lay out and make." In the first settlement of the colonies, as new roads were continually wanted, we find very frequently, in their laws, the appropriate expressions for doing the act, and it is uniformly "lay out and make." Such is the case in the States, since the Revolution; and, indeed, in the States of Maryland and Indiana they have recognised the very distinction for which I contend; for, where they prescribe or fix the course or site, the word establish is used; when they intend to construct, they "lay out and make," or "open." And ever since the adoption of this Constitution, you have observed the same distinction. When you intend to designate only, as in the case of post roads, you "establish;" when you would construct, as in the Cumberland road, your language is, "to lay out and make." Hence, sir, the literal, ordinary, statute, and Constitutional meaning, all combine to deny to this word any creative power.

But, these post offices and post roads were to be established for the benefit of the people, in the States. There are three classes of powers in the Constitution—exclusive, alternate, and concurrent. The first are those where the States are prohibited, such as to coin money, make treaties, &c. The second, those which belong exclusively to us, while we continue to exercise them, but when we cease, they revert to the States; such as "an uniform rule of naturalization," and a "uniform standard of weights and measures." The last, is where both may exercise them at the same time; such is the power "to lay and collect taxes." Now, what is the character of this power over post roads, and to which of these classes does it belong? Can a State exercise it while it is exercised by Congress? Surely the States never intended to give you the power to make your roads where you pleased, and divert the channels of information from their ordinary course, without reserving to themselves the power to establish such as they might need. It then comes to this; if you have a right to make your own roads, for your use, they retain the power to establish State post roads for their own convenience. But the fair conclusion is, that Congress can only designate existing roads, and, while they exercise this power, the States cannot.

I know it will be said, for it has been said already, that, if all this be true, the power is incomplete. The State may obstruct, or shut up their roads, and subject the whole establishment to their control. A very reasonable supposition! Before the adoption of the Constitution, the people were united by strong ties, and one of the objects of that instrument was, "to form a more perfect union." They can never dispense with roads; they will and must have them where they have inhabitants, where they need them the most, and there your mail can be carried, and nowhere else was it intended it should go. Sir, the framers of the Constitution were not so visionary as to provide against mere possible dangers. They knew the characteristic propensity of the people; that there was, always had been, and always would be, in them, a most unconquerable thirst for information. This propensity is proverbial, and, in some parts, grown almost into an impertinent curiosity—so much so, that it is said of the venerable Franklin, that, when he journeyed through a part of New England, and had occasion to stop at any house, he would, to save himself trouble, call all the family together, inform them that his name was Benjamin Franklin, that he had come from Philadelphia, was bound to Boston, what was his business, and when he expected to return. Have you ever yet known the people opposing the establishment of a post route near them? The contest is always for it. Witness the scene in a country village, when the post arrives. The tailor quits his shears, and leaves his goose to cool; the blacksmith loses his welding heat; and even the toper foregoes his glass, when almost to his lip, and all gather round, to hear the newspapers. "Houses in ashes, and the fall of stocks; births, deaths, and marriages;" political conflicts, personal abuse, poetry, and wit—nonsense, and news—all devoured up "with a greedy ear," no matter whether true or false. Sir, when this inordinate passion for news shall be extinguished, then will have arrived that dead calm, that lethargy of despotism, which never afflicted any country; and, when that shall have arrived, you cannot only make roads, but do any thing else. You may imagine a thousand dangers greater than this; you may suppose that the States would obstruct your Executive and Judicial officers and members of Congress, and this is to afford you a pretext for Executive, Judiciary, and Congress roads. Sir, in our search for power, we become visionary and capricious. A political and human constitution have a striking analogy. They both have their birth, childhood, maturity, and old age; and, with proper care, prudence, and diligence, can get through the period of their existence with comfort and honor to themselves, and leave, perhaps, a comfortable legacy to those who succeed them. But no extravagance, no wild speculation—and, particularly, never send for the doctor before you are sick. The epitaph—"I was well, and would be better—I took physic, and here I am," is an admonition to every visionary legislator.

I come now to a provision of the Constitution much relied on, and much perverted; "common defence and general welfare." Here an honorable member from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) found his military road. The syllogism I suppose to be this: Congress has power to provide for the common defence and general welfare—to make roads and canals is for the common defence and general welfare; therefore, Congress has power to make roads and canals. If the major be true, I admit the conclusion, or any other conclusion, to do what you please. But this is no grant of power; it is the apology or the purpose of a grant. The words of the grant are, "to lay and collect taxes," &c., "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare," but all imposts, &c., shall be equal. Here are the grant, the object, and the limitation or exception. The preamble to the Constitution gives you the end or design. The means are provided and defined in the instrument itself. The first enumerated was a power over the purse. This was necessary, but it was new, and one of which the people of the States were jealous. A reason must be given for this, and that given was the true one; it was, that they might pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare, as defined in the Constitution. If you have, in this clause, four distinct enumerated powers, why is the limitation or exception which applies to the first, placed after the last? If "general welfare" is a power granted, what need of the rest, or indeed of any other? The first and second are specific powers; the third includes them both; and the fourth swallows up all three. Besides, it would be next to ridiculous to give to Congress a power "to pay debts." There is a grant to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and by another provision, debts previously contracted were recognised under "this Constitution." Now, as he who contracts a debt, must necessarily obligate for its payment, no such grant was necessary, and none made. This "to pay the debts" was the reason and purpose of the grant of taxation, and if this, so were those of common defence and general welfare. The true reason for the phraseology was to save the necessity of repeating the words "Congress shall have power," at the beginning of every grant—otherwise the words would have stood thus: "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare, Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, &c., but all imposts, &c. shall be equal."

If these, then, are not grants of power, neither are they an unlimited authority to appropriate money. If the designs in the preamble are to be effected by the provisions in the Constitution, and in no other way, it follows that this is the case in the application of your money. Your common defence is defined in the Constitution, and extends to protection from external violence and internal feuds, and the manner of protection is specially prescribed. Your general welfare extends to foreign intercourse—justice and equality among the members of the Confederacy—a perpetuity of the Government—and the protection of its members in the discharge of their respective functions. Here, too, the manner is prescribed and the power limited and defined. If, then, these expressions are restricted and definite, it follows that your money can only be applied to the execution of these definite Constitutional powers.

But, in these latter days, a new sect of expounders of the Constitution has sprung up. They admit that this power, being derivative, cannot be inferred from any one of those enumerated, but it may from all. With all the improvements in the science of chemistry, no one, it is presumed, ever suspected that it would be used to expound the Constitution of the United States. And yet such seems to be the fact. These wise men commence an analysis of a particular power, and find several ingredients there; they then decompose another, and find a few more particles; and so on through some fifteen or twenty. They then put their results together, perform the process of amalgamation—a very fashionable process at this time—and thus form one simple substance, which they denominate the power of “roads and canals,” or “internal improvement.” In effect it amounts to this: This power is not “necessary and proper” for the execution of either of the others, but for all. No one requires it, yet every one requires it. Here is a power derived from others, different in their character—some exclusive, some alternate, and others concurrent—and pray of which does this partake? What are the complexion and features of this child of twenty fathers? Whose image and superscription does it bear? Sir, I protest I cannot reason against such logic. It transcends my limited understanding. But, yield to this, and where are you to stop? It can be neither limited nor defined. It is an ocean without a shore. It is, indeed, a substantial, efficient, not an imaginary “great central power unknown to the Constitution.” Its centre is everywhere, its circumference nowhere. Like Omnipotence itself, no mortal eye can behold it; it is seen only through the magnificence of its works. I am aware that my Constitutional doctrines are old-fashioned. The love of power is inherent. It is often sought with the best motives. The patriot is apt to believe that, if he had more power, he could do more good; and when we restrain or circumscribe him, he asks, with a sigh, What! “have we not power to do good?” But we ought to remember that this power to do good, has been the plea of every tyrant, from Nimrod, the hunter, down to Ferdinand, the beloved; and when obtained, they have reserved the good to themselves, and entailed the slavery, with all its misery and mischiefs, on those who granted it and their descendants.

But if you, by searching, can find this power, what good is to result from its exercise? You now can scarcely fulfil your legitimate duties, and are wishing to throw off some of them on other departments. And while your business is multiplying, you will introduce into Congress a subject more perplexing, one which will excite more jealousy, provoke more discord, and induce more management, if not intrigue, than all others combined.

Will you appropriate equally? To do this, we must first ascertain what States have already received any thing, and how much, and deduct it from their share. The two millions for the Cumberland road must be put into a common fund, and deducted from the shares of those States which have had the benefit of it. Whose turn comes first? This is a very important inquiry. The first important canal you construct will so exhaust your Treasury, and encumber you with debt, that it will be the last. What is your rule of equality? Among the States, probably according to their Representatives, as this is your rule of taxation; and, if you proceed in this, taxation must come. Now, would this be right? In the canal which is to unite the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware, the State of Delaware would incur most of the expense, and receive least of the profits. In Maryland, some expense and considerable profit. Pennsylvania, none of the expense and most of the profits. Delaware would draw one part in 213, Maryland 9, and Pennsylvania 26.

Will you divide unequally and at discretion? Let the time come when Congress would find appropriate money for the benefit of a majority, to the exclusion of a minority, and your Union is in the most imminent peril. Will you tell New England that, since they have made their roads at their own expense, that you will now take their money to make yours? That, although roads across the mountains give a direct benefit to some States, yet, as we are remotely benefited, we have no right to complain? Begin a bargaining system of this sort, and see how long it will last. Treat the complaints of an injured minority as the “capricious squalls of a child, which does not know whether it is aggrieved or not,” and see how soon “this child will assume the voice and courage” and strength of a man. Suppose we should succeed in throwing back on you your own principles—suppose we should attempt a system of education and establish a national university, and surely nothing can be more emphatically “internal improvement” than that which goes to improve the human mind—suppose we should make a donation of a hundred millions to Cambridge, whose foundation and reputation are so well established. Location is nothing, and if gentlemen in the South and West would be obliged to send their children some fifteen hundred miles, they are remotely benefited, and must not complain.

One, and not the least of the evils which is to result from this system, is, to paralyze the exertions in the States. They will always expect more of you than you can perform. They will neglect to improve their roads in waiting for you, and they will wait in vain. The ordinary expenses, in Maine, of repairing and making roads, is not less than $300,000 annually. Supposing this to be an average with the other States, and that it would cost you two dollars to do what they might perform for one; the annual expenditures for ordinary repairs would exceed $18,000,000. If you add to this the splendid scheme presented by the honorable member from Missouri, in his amendment, you may at once perceive the ordinary revenues of the United States, for fifty years, would not accomplish the object. Taxation, internal, direct, and oppressive, would be the inevitable result.

Sir, gentlemen who would commence this mad project, are bound to show us “the ways and means." What are they? You have read of a man who began his house without funds—and how, "those who passed by wagged their heads, and said one to another, this man began to build, and was not able to finish." This will be our case. The member from Missouri has, however, undertaken to become the Minister of Finance, and "in opening the budget," has told us how he will get the money. He is first to take that paid to the Revolutionary pensioners after they are dead. It is an old adage, "that those who wait for dead men's shoes will go barefoot." And there is another almost as true, "that pensioners never die;" that is, I presume, never die off the list. Not that I wish the old fellows to die. God preserve them, I say, many years. They will serve to call to our remembrance the principles of the Revolution, and which are now almost forgotten. But, sir, if we continue as ingenious in finding out means of expenditure as we now are, if that honorable member will present us a few more expeditions to the Upper Falls of the Missouri, to protect trespasses on the Indians, I strongly suspect that the fruit of this tree will be picked up quite as fast as it falls. His next source of revenue is derived from a cessation of the annual appropriation for the public buildings. If he calculates that for fifty years we shall expend less than we do now in this city, he calculates without his host. But when the fortifications are finished! Oh then, to be sure! Stop a little. Look at the reports and plans of your War Department, and $20,000,000 will not complete the works in contemplation. And his supposition that the gradual increase of the revenue will yield a surplus, is altogether as visionary. The honorable member forgot to remember that the increase of expenditure has far surpassed that of the income. In 1803, the public debt was about $70,000,000, receipts $14,000,000, and the expenses of Government between three and four millions. At this time the public debt is about $90,000,000; the average income $19,000,000, and the ordinary expenditures $11,000,000; of the income is $1,500,000, annual sale of public lands—a fund always diminishing. The Sinking Fund, as established in 1817, with proper economy, would by this time have reduced our public debt to forty instead of ninety millions.

Sir, for twenty years, the surplus revenue derived from the sources suggested by the honorable member, would not be sufficient to complete Goose Creek Canal. But, sir, I have already dwelt too long on this disgusting scheme and its disastrous results. For my constituents, I see nothing but taxes, taxes without any the least equivalent—I see that the Constitution is made to mean just what the interest of a majority shall dictate; that the rights of the States are nominal—and that this measure is to reduce them below the grade of petty corporations. And where can the encroachment be resisted? No where but in this Senate. For this purpose were we ordered to this post. The States expect us to do our duty. We should never surrender. If we fall in the conflict our country will consecrate our fame. Twice, within my experience, has this Senate stood firm, and refused to admit a State into the Union, shorn in the least of the political powers enjoyed by the rest; and that, too, against strong popular excitement. Once, at least, have we stood firm and fast against Executive power, and in spite of strong partialities. I trust that we shall not yet give way, but stand to our duty like the rock in the ocean, which defies the storm.

THURSDAY, April 22.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Rezin Rawlings and John Locke, executors of Daniel Rawlings; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of John A. Webster, late sailing-master in the naval service of the United States, praying indemnity for property lost while in the discharge of his duty; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The Senate then resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration, in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives, "to procure the necessary surveys for roads and canals," together with a new bill, proposed by Mr. BENTON, as a substitute for that bill. Mr. BARBOUR was called to the chair.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, again took the floor, and concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday, against both the bill and the proposed amendment, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. CHANDLER then moved to amend the amendment, by inserting a proviso requiring the assent of three-fourths of the States, previous to the commencement of the contemplated surveys. This was not agreed to.

Mr. TALBOT opposed the amendment, on the ground that a bill, of the vast extent proposed by Mr. BENTON, could not possibly be matured at the present session of Congress.

Mr. SMITH considered the original bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, as merely authorizing the President to take a topographical view of the United States, and did not consider it as involving the question of the constitutionality of making roads and canals.

A division of the question was called for. The question was then declared to be upon striking out the original bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, made a few remarks in favor of the bill. He contended for the power, on the part of Congress, to make roads and canals. Independent of the Constitutional question, he thought this appropriation ought to be made, for the purpose of obtaining topographical information.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The honorable member from Kentucky, who has just sat down, has endeavored to soothe our fears as to this bill, by representing it as only a harmless measure, not creating either roads or canals, and only providing for surveying extensively, and employing engineers now in pay, at the trifling expense of $30,000. The foolish Trojans regarded the wooden horse prepared by the cunning Greeks, as harmless; demolished a part of their walls for its introduction; and their city was destroyed. Does this bill contain in its womb fewer combustibles, or such as are less likely to inflame geographical interests, and destroy the Union, should we provide for their introduction, by levelling those outworks by which the Constitution is defended? The honorable member from Missouri has candidly removed the mask, with which the design is endeavored to be concealed by the bill, and designated certain roads and canals to be made in the amendment he has proposed; the expense of which would amount to incomputable millions. The whole subject of roads and canals is therefore before the Senate.

After the admirable argument we have heard from the honorable member from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) with which I concur except as to a single point, it may seem presumption in me, to attempt, or to hope I shall be able, to add any thing new; and if I should fail, I must throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate. Had the heathen deities been now alive, I might have invoked Æsculapius, Minerva, and even Momus, to aid me in the effort; or had our two old parties, guided and designated by comprehensible principles, yet existed, I might have addressed myself to them. But all I can now do is to call up a jury before the eyes of the Senate, de mediatæ linguæ, composed of the most eminent ghosts of these parties, with General Washington their foreman. Is it not certain that they would unanimously agree in a verdict, that this internal power now claimed, was unconstitutional? Although these parties are dead, new ones have arisen even better defined by their names and principles, both imported from France, where they are in full operation; namely, ultras and radicals. The first party, striving daily to overturn the charter granted to the people by a King; the second, adhering to the roots or principles of that charter. The same is the case as to our Constitution. The plumes of our parties are respectively composed, one of a single white feather, the other of feathers of various colors, among which there is, unfortunately, a white one also; and whenever the radical party are influenced by any project, dictated by local interest or prejudice, it most injudiciously picks out of its crest all the other feathers, retains one only, mounts the white cockade, and acts upon occasion after occasion with its adversary.

Thus the constitutionality of the claim on behalf of the Federal Government to exercise local internal powers, as in the case of roads and canals, is gradually gaining ground by the acts of those who deny, theoretically, the principle.

Let us examine the grounds upon which this Federal power is inferred, by the radical party, from the Constitution, through the influence of local calculations. The chief reliance is placed upon the word "establish." Congress shall have power "to establish post roads." This word has been expounded by Congress itself, from the adoption of the Constitution; when its meaning was fresh, down to the present time, when its meaning is questioned, by some thousands of constructions. It has passed a multitude of laws to establish, and many to discontinue post roads.

Was any road ever actually made in virtue of the word establish, or ever obliterated or shut up, in virtue of the word discontinue? Did Congress, in any one of these numerous instances, construe the word establish as equivalent to the word make? The mail is directed to pass from one place to another, without making a road for that purpose, and the word establish was never contemplated as requiring that a road should be made to comply with the laws. These contemporaneous and continued constructions seem to be conclusive. But, are canals, also, now united with roads, justified by the word establish? Happily, the Constitution does not give to Congress a power to establish post canals. When the two powers, therefore, are united, it is evident that no reliance is placed on the word establish, as it relates to roads, because canals, to which that word does not extend, are associated with them.

It is remarkable that the framers of the Constitution have themselves, in the third sentence, after using the word establish, indicated the meaning they applied to it. Power to constitute tribunals is given to Congress. This is a word equivalent to create or make. Congress are, therefore, empowered to create inferior tribunals, because they could not exist without such creation, and only to establish post roads, because roads might and did exist without any necessity for making or creating them by Congress. And according to this plain distinction between the words, exhibited by the framers of the Constitution, Congress has invariably legislated. It has made or created tribunals, and selected roads for mail routes. If it had selected State courts for inferior Federal tribunals, and made, created, or constituted roads and canals, it would have wandered from the Constitution in both cases.

The next clause of the Constitution resorted to, for the purpose of justifying a Federal power to make State roads and canals, is in these words: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with Indian tribes." Whether the word commerce is used in a general or restricted sense, is the question. If in a general and unrestricted sense, it would reach the whole intercourse among men, and even include the connubial. There could not exist any social intercourse which it would not include, and the Federal Government would receive from this clause an absolute, consolidated, and unlimited power; for what power can exceed that of regulating the whole intercourse or commerce of the members composing a society?

It must, therefore, have been used in a restricted sense, to sustain the intention of the Constitution to create a limited Federal Government. To enforce the restriction intended by the word "commerce," the United States are placed between foreign nations and Indian tribes, as if to fortify them on both sides, against applying a meaning to the word "commerce" in their case, which was not applicable to it in the cases of foreign nations and Indian tribes. Does the word "commerce" give a power to Congress to make roads and canals for these nations and tribes? If not, as this word is used in the clause as equally applicable to all three of its members, it follows, irresistibly, that it does not empower Congress to make roads and canals for the States. Does it empower Congress to regulate wealth and poverty among the individuals composing foreign nations, or between Indian tribes? If not, it follows, as conclusively, that it does not give Congress a power to regulate wealth or poverty, either between the States, or between the individuals composing a State. The words "to regulate commerce," being used in reference to three subjects, without any distinction between them, are used in the same sense as to all, and a construction obviously absurd as to two, must be equally so as to the third. A contrary construction would degrade the States below the Indian tribes. Their consent is asked, and usually bought; nor is a road made through their territory without obtaining it; and it is, I suppose, upon this Indian authority that the consent of a State is considered by some gentlemen as conveying a power to Congress to make roads and canals, and also to buy and hold lands.

Let us, sir, examine this doctrine. Nations unrestricted by any compact, are not in the situation of the United States. Their governments may grant or sell powers to other governments, and, among them, the power, in one, of making a road or canal; or that of buying and holding lands within the territory of another. But both the Federal and State governments are subjected to the restrictions of a compact. The former can only obtain specified and limited possessions within the territories of a State, with their consent, and the latter are restricted from enlarging the powers of the Federal Government, except by the consent of a large majority of the States; and over all acquisitions of landed property which the Federal Government can constitutionally obtain, that Government is invested with exclusive legislation. Can it obtain any landed property without acquiring the exclusive legislation attached, by the Constitution, to all that species of property which it is allowed to acquire; or is there any intimation in the Constitution allowing the Federal Government to acquire landed property without the concomitant of exclusive legislation, attached to all such acquisitions allowed to be made by the Constitution? By what tenure would the Federal Government hold lands, acquired by the consent of a State? Would the tenure be a mortmain, feudal, or personal and allodial. Every State has laws for regulating the titles to real property. Is such a title in the Federal Government provided for by any of these laws? In what character could it sustain an ejectment against an intruder? The defendant is not bound to prove any title, but the plaintiff must show one under the State laws, before he can recover. By these laws no association or corporation can acquire or hold lands, unless empowered to do so by a special law of the State. If associations of individuals can hold them, exonerated from the laws of descent, and transmissible to successors, then religious or any other associations might hold lands in an associated capacity.

To avoid so obvious an evil, there are but two cases, generally speaking, in which the title to lands can be sustained—those of inheritance and corporations, under positive laws conveying the right. The power of the Federal Government to hold land within a State, by consent, gift, or purchase, must come within the purview of one of these cases. Individual inheritance is out of the question. A corporate right is the only inquiry. I both admit and contend, that the Federal Government is extremely similar to a corporation. It received, and exists, under a charter granted by sovereign States, stipulating that this charter should not be altered except in specified modes. The charter bestows upon it no right to acquire or hold land, except in specified cases, to all of which exclusive legislation is attached. It is true, that refuge against these arguments is sought for, under the idea of some indefinite character attached to the word government; but, if this evasion is sound, the Federal Government ceases to be limited by the Constitution, its only character; and the novel result ensues, that thirteen sovereignties, now twenty-four, become the creatures of their own creature.

Farther to evade it, we are frequently told, that the Federal Government has purchased Louisiana, and sundry extensive tracts of country; and that, if these acquisitions are justifiable, the acquisitions of land by it, within a State, must also be proper. The reply is, that all these territorial acquisitions, whether from France, Spain, or the Indians, have been made under the treaty-making power, given to the Federal Government by the Constitution. But these acquisitions are not made for the benefit of the Federal Government, or to increase its Constitutional power, but for the benefit of the confederated States, and to increase the power of their Union. For this latter purpose, and not to aggrandize the Federal Government, the treaty-making power, by which these acquisitions were obtained, only made the Federal Government a trustee, of which the clause for converting them into States is almost a demonstration.

As to this point, if a State can give or sell to the Federal Government a part of itself, except in the permitted cases, or give or sell to Congress any judicial or legislative power at all, it may transfer to it all its rights, violate the Federal compact, and disorder or destroy its division of powers.

The last source from which the power to make roads and canals is attempted to be extracted, is the right to make war, and to this power that of taxation has been united, for the sake of the inference, that the endowment of the Federal Government with these two mighty powers, precludes the idea of its not possessing the comparatively inferior powers of making roads and canals; and that these great powers may be better executed, by the inference, that these, and all the other inferior powers convenient to them, were constructively bestowed. The confidence supposed to be placed in the Federal Government by the grant of the two great powers, is considered as a proof that the States did not intend to withhold from that Government the minor powers of making roads and canals: since every minor power whatsoever may be considered as having some influence, near or remote, upon the major powers of war and taxation. Thus, all minor powers are absorbed by these two greater powers, and the States possess no reserved powers, unless such as are of greater magnitude than those of war and taxation. The exploded doctrines of allegiance and protection are thus substantially revived, and a complete subjection substituted for the sovereignty of the States. The law of power is substituted for the law of compact, and the ancient club law, invented by one Hercules, is revived. He used it to kill wild beasts; a precedent for using it to kill State rights; and Cæsar's famous doctrine, inferring that money and men were irresistible, is proposed for the adoption of public opinion. These being given to the Federal Government, State rights ought of course fall before their prowess. It is, in truth, both the theory and practice of the Holy Alliance. Guns are substituted for clubs, money for justice, and Naples and Spain have felt the force of this mode of reasoning.

It was said by an honorable member from Kentucky, and denied by an honorable member from Maryland, that Congress had heretofore asserted the power of the Federal Government to make roads and canals; and the first gentleman urged the decision as an authority sufficient to establish the power. If authority, and not the Constitution, is to decide this question, that which certainly exists, will overbalance that which is denied to exist; especially when it proceeds from an unexpected quarter, warped by no prejudice in favor of State rights, as Congress might possibly have been in favor of Federal powers. In the decision of the New York steamboat case by the Supreme Court of the United States, it is asserted, that "the completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself, and turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass." A power to make roads and canals is claimed upon the ground, that they are appurtenances of commerce. Admitting them to be so, then the decision of the court, that the reservation of internal commerce to the States is complete, includes roads and canals as appurtenances of this internal commerce, and the principle upon which the inference is founded, assigning a power to make them to Congress, is adverse to the conclusion. The power over external commerce, with its legitimate appurtenances, is given to the Federal Government; that over internal commerce, says the court, is completely reserved to the States. Are roads and canals appurtenances of external or internal commerce? The court say that roads, ferries, &c., constitute a portion of the "mass" of powers, appertaining to internal commerce, reserved with it to the States "completely."

Having passed rapidly over the construction of the Constitution involved in the question concerning roads and canals, I will now concisely advert to the expediency of the policy proposed. It is obvious that, wherever the exercise of local internal powers begins, representation ends, because Congress, acting by a majority, without local fellow feeling, can never constitute a representation of the geographical interests and climates at the extremities of the United States, North or South, East or West. But this objection, sustained by the soundest principle for the preservation of a free Government, if any such principle exists, is evaded both by the tariff and internal improvement projects, by delusive promises to compensate the sufferers. These projects are near relations, good friends, and kind neighbors to each other. They will, therefore, undoubtedly carry into effect the doctrine of compensations between themselves, so long as they must unite to succeed. But when, in fact or in history, was it ever known that the thief or the robber, nations or geographical districts, self-interest or combined capitalists, transferred the money of others to themselves by fraud, force, or law, in order to make compensations, or obtained any local advantage for themselves with an intention of bestowing on those at whose expense they obtained it an equivalent local advantage? The idea is, indeed, suggested, of giving money to the States, in proportion to their population, to be employed in local improvements. But what can be gained by this, except an enhancement of expense, and an increase of patronage? All projects for transferring the property of some people to others are produced by speculations precisely opposite to an intention of compensating the losers. Partiality, and a design to gain and to keep as much money, and as many exclusive advantages as possible, suggest them before their birth, and sustain them as long as they live. In the case of roads and canals, this partiality would inevitably ensue from the incurable inefficiency of the representation in Congress to exercise local powers, either with justice or discretion. The attempt will scatter the flames of discord, and the frauds of combinations, among the States, which may probably destroy their union; so that this little, harmless, thirty thousand dollar bill, is not only fraught with inconceivable millions of expense, but with an inconceivable number of causes for partialities and discord.

But it may be said that these are fears of theory, and that they are proved to be groundless by the evidence of experience. In order to establish the fitness of Congress for internal improvements, and the economical application of money to these objects, we may be called upon to open our eyes and contemplate its exploits. We behold its taste and progress in the beautiful internal improvements, exhibited in the Capitol square and the grounds about the President's house, although they consist of several acres, and have not enjoyed the benefit of Congressional capacity for internal improvements for more than thirty-five years. We behold a botanic garden from an eminence, disclosing all its splendors, and inspiring an ecstasy, causing us to regret that Linnæus is not alive, that we might send for him to participate in the delightful spectacle. And we have only to refer to a succession of laws concerning the Cumberland road, in order to ascertain the degree of economy with which Congress is capable of effecting internal improvements, equal in cheapness and beauty to those I have enumerated—improvements which may chain the States together, and become a happy substitute for the decaying principle of a division of powers, so that when they cease to be united by the Constitution, they may be kept together by roads and canals.

Weighty as this argument, derived from experience, may be viewed by some, to establish the fitness of the Federal Government for internal improvements, yet it cannot obliterate from my mind a conviction, long nourished, as the best security for human liberty and happiness, it having been planted there by almost all political patriots who have taken it into consideration, namely, that the policy of leaving individuals, partnerships, and States, as much as possible to pursue their own interest, in their own way, is the only good evidence that the Government is founded in reason and justice, and not in error and fraud.

When Mr. TAYLOR had concluded—

The question on striking out the original bill was then put, and decided in the negative.—The yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Edwards, Elliot, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, King of New York, Knight, Macon, Mills, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, Van Buren, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Brown, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, King of Alabama, Lloyd of Maryland, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Van Dyke, and Ware—21.

The Senate having thus refused to strike out the original bill, the question recurred upon that bill. Mr. HAYNE moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed to Monday next. This motion gave rise to a short desultory debate, between Messrs. FINDLAY, NOBLE, and BROWN. It was superseded, however, by a motion to adjourn, which was carried by the casting vote of the Chair; and the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 23.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the Secretary of War was required to report to the Senate how far the act has been executed, entitled "An act for the relief of Nimrod Farrow, Richard Harris, and their securities," approved 3d March, 1823.

Mr. HAYNE presented the memorial of E. Littell, bookseller, of Philadelphia, praying that no additional duties may be imposed on imported books; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act supplementary to an act, approved on the 3d day of March, 1819, entitled 'An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices,'" "An act making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1824;" "An act changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water course, in the State of Mississippi, and Territory of Arkansas;" and "An act granting to the counties or parishes of each State and Territory of the United States, in which the public lands are situated, the right of pre-emption to quarter sections of land, for seats of justice within the same:" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. BARTON moved that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate of the 29th of December last, directing an inquiry into the expediency of exposing the salines and lead mines of the United States to public sale. Mr. B. stated that, when this resolution was referred, the committee had directed an inquiry to be made of the quantity of land reserved from sale as salines and lead mines; of the leases that had heretofore been made of mines and salines, and the proceeds thereof to the Treasury—that it had not been in the power of the Department to furnish that information, until a late day, owing to the want of proper returns to the Department; and that, from the late period of the session, the committee believed it impracticable to mature any measure upon this subject at the present session; and had, therefore, instructed him to submit this motion.

The committee was discharged accordingly.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The Senate then resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill from the other House "to provide for the necessary surveys for roads and canals;" Mr. BARBOUR in the Chair.

Mr. TALBOT rose, in explanation of some remarks he had heretofore made on this subject. He conceived that no gentleman, by voting for this bill, would thereby pledge himself to support a general system of internal improvements, when the same should be brought forward.

Mr. SMITH thought that the passage of this bill might, hereafter, be taken as a recognition of the power of Congress to construct roads and canals; he feared that it might be considered as the entering wedge to the great system of improvements, the power to adopt which, he for one was not disposed to admit. He, therefore, proposed to amend the bill, by attaching to it a proviso, "that nothing herein contained shall be taken to affirm or admit the power of Congress, on their own authority, to make roads and canals in any State of the Union."

Mr. RUGGLES made some remarks in favor of the principles of the bill, and of pursuing such measures as would tend to produce a more intimate connexion between the Atlantic States and the valley of the Mississippi, which must hereafter contain a population bearing a great proportion to that of the whole country. The interest of both these sections of our country, he argued, would be greatly promoted by such a measure.

Messrs. EATON, BROWN, LLOYD, of Maryland, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, and NOBLE, opposed the amendment, and Messrs. MILLS, VAN DYKE, and SMITH, supported it. Mr. VAN DYKE proposed to amend the amendment, by inserting a provision that, previous to any survey being made under this act, the consent of the State in which such survey is to be made shall be obtained. Messrs. RUGGLES and BENTON made a few remarks on this subject. The question was then put, and decided against Mr. VAN DYKE's amendment, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Chandler, Elliott, Gaillard, King of New York, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Mills, Palmer, Smith, Taylor of Virginia, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Ware—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Branch, Brown, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Miss., Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Knight, Lloyd of Maryland, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Ruggles, Seymour, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, and Williams—28.

The question then recurred upon the amendment proposed by Mr. SMITH. Upon this question Messrs. MACON, HOLMES of Maine, CHANDLER, and NOBLE, made a few observations.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "admit," and inserting in its stead the word "deny," so that it should read "that nothing herein contained shall be taken to affirm or deny the power of Congress, on their own authority, to make roads and canals in any State of the Union." This amendment was discussed by Messrs. TAYLOR of Virginia, BROWN, and HAYNE. The question was put, and decided in the negative—ayes 10, noes 36, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Brown, Hayne, Josiah S. Johnston, Kelly, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Ruggles, Seymour, Talbot, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Henry Johnson, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Macon, Mills, Noble, Palmer, Smith, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Ware.

The question upon the amendment, as proposed by Mr. SMITH, was then put, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, D'Wolf, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Mills, Palmer, Smith, Taylor of Virginia, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Ware—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Brown, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, and Williams—25.

Mr. HAYNE then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next. This was not agreed to.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, stated the grounds upon which he should vote for the bill—he did not consider it as involving the question upon the Constitutional right of Congress to make public improvements—but merely as a means of obtaining information, which might be of great importance to the Government.

Mr. MACON explained the reasons why he should vote against the bill. He could not believe that this bill was clear from the Constitutional objection, which he thought very forcible and unanswerable, and he proceeded to advance other considerations against the bill.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, then proposed to amend the bill, by inserting a clause as follows:

"Provided, and the faith of the United States is hereby pledged, that no money shall be expended for roads or canals, except it be among the several States, and in the same proportion as direct taxes are laid and assessed, under the provisions of the Constitution."

Messrs. LLOYD of Maryland, NOBLE, and TALBOT, opposed the adoption of this amendment, and Messrs. HOLMES of Maine and BRANCH advocated it.

The question on the amendment was taken, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Bell, Branch, Chandler, D'Wolf, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Mills, Palmer, Taylor of Virginia, Van Buren, and Ware—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Brown, Clayton, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lloyd of Maryland, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, Van Dyke, and Williams—27.

Mr. CHANDLER proposed an amendment, which was not concurred in by the Senate.

Messrs. FINDLAY, MILLS, and LLOYD of Maryland, made a few further remarks upon the subject.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment. On ordering it to a third reading, the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Brown, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Ruggles, Smith, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, and Williams—25.

SATURDAY, April 24.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of War, complying with a resolution of the Senate, of the 21st instant, respecting the number of arms furnished the United States by the State of South Carolina, during the late war. The report was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports," reported the same with amendments; which were read. He also laid on the table a statement of the present duties on imports, compared with those proposed by the last mentioned bill. The amendments and statement were ordered to be printed.

Mr. DICKERSON gave notice that he would, on Tuesday next, call for the consideration of said bill.

Mr. HENRY JOHNSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the adjustment, upon equitable principles, of the claims of Colonel John Smith, of Louisiana, against the United States, for moneys paid the troops of the United States by his deceased son, A. Smith, in his lifetime, during the late war.

The four bills yesterday brought up from the House of Representatives for concurrence, were severally read twice, by unanimous consent; and the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, approved on the third day of March, 1819, entitled 'An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices,'" the bill, entitled "An act changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water course, in the State of Mississippi and Territory of Arkansas;" and the bill, entitled "An act granting to the counties or parishes of each State and Territory of the United States in which the public lands are situated, the right of pre-emption to quarter sections of land for seats of justice within the same," were severally referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1824," was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion, by Mr. TALBOT, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, on motion, it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, "further to amend the judiciary system of the United States, and to establish the circuit courts;" together with an amendment proposed thereto by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky. Mr. BRANCH was called to the Chair. After the reading of the bill and amendment, the subject was postponed to Monday next.

Mr. JACKSON, from the joint committee of both Houses, appointed to examine and report upon the business necessary to be acted upon at the present session of Congress, and at what time the session may be closed, submitted a report in part. The committee report a schedule of the business which, in their opinion, ought to be acted upon previous to the adjournment of Congress. The report was read, and laid upon the table.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of Mary James;" "An act to alter the judicial districts of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes;" "An act for the relief of Isaac Collyer, and others;" "An act for the relief of Alvin Bronson;" "An act to provide for the sale of lands conveyed to the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes;" "An act to authorize masters of vessels, in certain cases, to clear out either at the custom-house of Petersburg, or that of Richmond;" and "An act to allow the bounty to vessels employed in the cod fisheries, in certain cases;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill "supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia,'" and the bill "explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile," were severally read the third time, passed, and sent to the other House for concurrence.

The bill which originated in the Senate, "to provide for the settlement of certain pecuniary claims against the United States," was read the third time.

Messrs. TAYLOR, of Virginia, and BARBOUR, advocated the passage of this bill, and Messrs. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, RUGGLES, LANMAN, and TALBOT, opposed it. The question, "Shall the bill pass?" was then put, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Branch, Brown, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Kelly, King of Alabama, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, McIlvaine, Macon, Smith, Taylor of Indiana, Taylor of Virginia, and Van Dyke—19.

The bill from the other House, "to procure the necessary surveys for roads and canals," was read the third time. The question on its final passage was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

DELAWARE CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. VAN DYKE, from the select Committee on Roads and Canals to whom was referred the memorial of the President and Directors of the Delaware Canal Company, requesting the aid of the Government in their undertaking, submitted a report on that subject; accompanied by a bill "authorizing the subscription to the stock of the Delaware Canal Company." The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

The report is as follows:

The Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company was duly incorporated, some years since, by acts of the Legislatures of Delaware and Maryland, respectively. The capital stock is divided into shares of two hundred dollars. The maximum cost of the whole work is estimated at the sum of one million three hundred and fifty-four thousand three hundred and sixty-four dollars and sixty-four cents, and the amount of funds at present pledged for its execution may be assumed at seven hundred thousand dollars. The present condition of the company, and the route of the canal lately determined upon and fixed by the Board of Directors, with the aid of engineers of distinguished reputation and skill, are set forth in the annexed document, signed by the President and Secretary of the said Company, dated "March 27, 1824," marked A, and the report of the engineers, marked B, to which the committee refer as part of this report. The whole length of the canal will not exceed fourteen miles. The Board of Directors have made advantageous contracts for the completion of the eastern half of the canal, and the contractors have begun the work. Under these circumstances, the memorialists pray such aid as Congress, in its wisdom, may deem proper to grant.

The importance and utility of roads and canals, to facilitate and increase commercial intercourse among the several States of our widely extended Republic, have been so fully and ably represented in several reports, heretofore made to Congress, that it is thought unnecessary to enlarge further upon the subject.

The committee view the proposed canal as a work of great national importance, not only as one link in the chain of inland navigation along our seaboard, which has been for many years contemplated, but also as it will furnish to the Government, in time of war, great advantages in a more expeditious and cheap conveyance of troops and munitions of war across the peninsula between the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, the want of which was severely felt during our late hostilities with Great Britain. Under this impression, the committee deem the said canal worthy of the attention and patronage of Congress. The company being incorporated and organized, it is believed a subscription, on the part of the United States, for a certain number of shares of the capital stock, would encourage and insure the completion of the work, without infringing any principle of the Constitution, and without incurring any loss to the Government. The committee, therefore, report a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, in the name and for the use of the United States, for — shares of the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

ALABAMA CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, "to repeal, in part, an act to authorize the Territory of Alabama to form a constitution, and establish a State government," was taken up for consideration. This bill proposes to repeal that part of the act in question, which respects the navigation of the waters of the State of Alabama. Mr. KING moved to amend the bill, by striking out all but the enacting clause, and substituting another bill, merely giving the assent of Congress, to two acts of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, respecting tolls to be exacted on certain waters within that State, upon which improvements are intended. He remarked, at the same time, that, as objections had been made to the bill, as reported by the committee, he was willing to waive the subject for the present, but he wished to be understood as not giving up the ground, that the State had a Constitutional right to prescribe rules for the navigation of her own waters; and he should certainly bring the subject before the next session of Congress—but, at present, he only hoped that Congress would give its assent to the two laws in question, in order that the State might proceed in certain contemplated improvements in her navigable waters, as specified in those acts. Some discussion took place between Messrs. KING, of Alabama, HOLMES, of Maine, and TALBOT. Mr. KING then withdrew his amendment, and the question occurred on the original bill.

Mr. JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, stated the general provisions by which the navigation of the Western waters is regulated.

Mr. KELLY explained the facts connected with this request, on the part of Alabama, that she may be permitted to proceed in improving the navigation of the State. He stated the objects which were contemplated by these acts of the Legislature of that State, and which she did not wish to carry into effect while a single doubt remained of her Constitutional right to do so. He renewed the amendment, which had been offered, and withdrawn, by his colleague.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, then moved to amend the amendment, by inserting a provision, that this act shall not be understood as giving to the State of Alabama any right not belonging to any of the original States in the Union.

Mr. LOWRIE was in favor of passing the bill, offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Alabama, and did not see the necessity of the proviso submitted by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. CRANDLER thought the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama involved the whole question of the repeal of that part of the act for the admission of Alabama into the Union, which imposes the restrictions upon her navigable waters.

Mr. BARTON was not willing to repeal that part of the act in question, so far as related to the natural waters of that State, but he thought the State ought to have the power to regulate the navigation of her artificial waters.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, made some further observations, in opposition to the amendment proposed by Mr. HOLMES. Mr. H. then withdrew his amendment.

Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, and MACON, made a few brief remarks. The amendment proposed by Mr. KELLY was then agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time.

MONDAY, April 26.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act granting to the counties or parishes, of each State and Territory of the United States, in which the public lands are situated, the right of pre-emption to quarter sections of land for seats of justice within the same," reported it without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. BROWN, the select Committee on Roads and Canals were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Lewis A. Tarascon, and others.

The seven bills brought up on Saturday from the House of Representatives, for concurrence, were severally read twice, by unanimous consent.

On motion, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary James," was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill, entitled "An act to alter the judicial districts of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes;" and the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of lands conveyed to the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes," were severally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Alvin Bronson," was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Collyer, and others;" the bill, entitled "An act to authorize masters of vessels, in certain cases, to clear out either at the custom-house of Petersburg or that of Richmond;" and the bill, entitled "An act to allow the bounty to vessels employed in the cod fisheries in certain cases;" were severally referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill authorizing the subscription of stock in the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company was read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of the 24th instant, instructing the Committee of Claims to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of Colonel John Smith, and agreed thereto.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act releasing the owners of the ship General Jackson from the payment of certain duties;" "An act for the relief of Arthur H. Henly;" "An act for the relief of the corporation of the church of St. Anne, and to authorize the extension of Larned street, in the town of Detroit;" "An act authorizing the issuing certain debentures to Barnard Thooft;" "An act for the relief of William N. Earle;" "An act for the relief of William Blagrove;" "An act for the relief of Joseph Wheaton;" "An act for the relief of John Thomas & Co.;" "An act for the relief of the assignees and legal representatives of John H. Piatt;" "An act for the relief of David Giffin and Samuel Hoag;" "An act for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Mims, deceased;" "An act for the relief of George B. R. Gove;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The twelve bills last brought up for concurrence were severally read twice, by unanimous consent.

On motion, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Arthur H. Henly;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William N. Earle;" the bill entitled "An act for the relief of David Giffin and Samuel Hoag;" the bill entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Mims, deceased, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of John Thomas & Co.;" and the bill for the relief of Joseph Wheaton; were severally referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill entitled "An act authorizing the issuing of certain debentures to Bernard Thooft;" the bill entitled "An act releasing the owners of the ship General Jackson from the payment of certain duties;" and the bill entitled "An act for the relief of George B. R. Gove," were severally referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of the corporation of the church of St. Anne, and to authorize the extension of Larned street, in the town of Detroit;" the bill entitled "An act for the relief of William Blagrove;" and the bill entitled "An act for the relief of the assignees and legal representatives of John H. Piatt," were severally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill "to repeal, in part, an act to authorize the Territory of Alabama to form a constitution and establish a State government," was read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. LANMAN, the title was altered, in order to render it more conformable to the bill, as amended. It is now entitled "An act to grant the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Alabama."

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, "further to amend the judiciary system of the United States, and to provide for the holding of the Circuit Courts," together with the amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. GAILLARD in the Chair. This bill provides that two sessions of the Supreme Court shall be held at Washington, annually—that the Judges of the Supreme Court shall be relieved from the duty of holding the Circuit Courts—that the United States shall be divided into ten districts, in each of which, courts shall be held by District Judges, with the same powers and duties as are now exercised and performed by the Circuit Courts.

Mr. JOHNSON's amendment is an entire new bill, and provides that there shall be three additional Circuit Courts; that the Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and nine Associate Justices; and that the concurrent opinion of seven Judges of the Supreme Court, (each Judge to deliver his opinion separately,) shall be required to invalidate any law of any of the States. The amendment was somewhat modified on motion of Mr. TALBOT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, stated the objects of his amendment. His plan was to extend the circuit system to all the Western States, upon the same principles that it rests upon in the other States. He spoke against the bill reported by the committee, as doing away the intimate and highly important connexion between the Supreme Court and the several District Courts.

Mr. VAN BUREN opposed the amendment, and stated the views of the committee in reporting the bill. He explained the difference between the present system and that proposed by the bill; and adverted to the absolute necessity, ere long, of some change in the judiciary system. He recapitulated the number of causes which had come before the Supreme Court, and been put off for want of time; and remarked that the proper administration of justice called loudly for some change. He also explained the propriety of some amendment, in regard to the Circuit Courts.

Mr. TALBOT addressed the Senate on the subject. He spoke of the great importance of the organization of the Judiciary. He advocated an increase of the number of Judges of the Supreme Court, as necessary to a fair and well-defined administration of justice. He believed there would be ample time for the decision of every cause before the Supreme Court, with some alteration of the terms of the Circuit Courts. He alluded to the great vexation and distress which had been experienced under the present system. Mr. T. spoke of evils which he apprehended would grow out of a separation of the Supreme and Circuit Courts, as leading to a too near connexion of the Judges of the Supreme Court with the other branches of the Government, and taking away their chief means of becoming acquainted with the various local laws and usages, and the judicial decisions, of the several States. He thought the present number of Judges of the Supreme Court to be too small for the proper administration of justice over such an extensive country, with so many various and conflicting interests. Mr. T. believed the amendment, proposed by his honorable colleague, much preferable to the bill reported by the committee. He thought the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court ought not to be given to the district judges. The salaries that had been given to them had not always brought men of the first legal talents into the office of district judge; and he feared that, in many instances, they would not be competent to the performance of the duties. The system proposed by the bill was unjust and unequal in respect to the Western States, and would not be submitted to. It was a great measure, making a radical change in the judiciary system; and it could not be expected that it would be adopted at the present session. It did not meet the wishes of the Western States; it did not extend to them equal advantages in the circuit court system, and it was altogether inadequate to remedy the evils now experienced. Mr. T. hoped that Congress would, at its present session, do something to relieve the people in his part of the country from the evils they were suffering in this respect.

Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted a few remarks on the subject; he was favorable to the plan suggested by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky—he thought the business of the Supreme Court might be transacted by changing the terms of the Circuit Courts. He replied to the objections which had been advanced against the proposed amendment. Mr. J. said he could never consent to the system reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BROWN opposed the bill reported by the committee, and was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN wished the gentleman from Kentucky to separate the last section of his amendment, which respects the opinions of the court on questions involving the laws of the States—as that was a question distinct from the rest of his proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON assented to the course suggested by the gentleman from New York, and accordingly withdrew the last section of his amendment.

Mr. HAYNE was opposed to the principle contained in the bill reported by the committee, which confines the Supreme Court to appellate jurisdiction—he thought the judges ought to perform circuit duties—that they ought not to be disconnected from the people; he was prepared for an increase of the number of judges, provided the business of the country required it. He said that the number of judges who exercised appellate jurisdiction in South Carolina was twelve; five in equity, and seven in law, each of whom performed circuit duties; and he thought there could be no great danger to the country from an increased number of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. VAN BUREN replied to the arguments advanced in favor of the amendment, and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and TALBOT, made a few further remarks.

Mr. BARBOUR moved the postponement of the subject till to-morrow. He thought the importance of the subject demanded the most mature consideration, as it would be much more easy to adopt than to get rid of any new judiciary system which might be adopted.

Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and TALBOT, opposed, and Messrs. LANMAN and TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke in favor of postponement.

Navy Appropriations—Fortification Bill.

SENATE.

Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted a new bill, as a substitute for the one now before the Senate. It provides for the establishment of a regular and uniform circuit court system, entirely distinct from the Supreme Court. Mr. J. stated that he was in favor of the amendment offered by the honorable member from Kentucky, and he only offered this proposition to the consideration of the Senate in case that of the gentleman from Kentucky should be rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR varied his motion, and the bill and amendments were ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, April 27.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the bill entitled "An act for the relief of George B. R. Gove," the bill entitled "An act releasing the owners of the ship General Jackson from the payment of certain duties;" and the bill entitled "An act authorizing the issuing of certain debentures to Bernard Thooft," reported them severally without amendment.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of War, showing how far the act for the relief of Nimrod Farrow, Richard Harris, and their securities, has been executed; made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the twenty-third instant. The report was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, laid on the table sundry documents, on the subject of acts of hostility from the Indians on the Mississippi towards American traders; and, on motion, they were ordered to be printed, for the use of the Senate.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, laid on the table statements from the Treasury, exhibiting the value of imported merchandise, praying a specific duty, and an ad valorem duty; and, on motion, they were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to sell and dispose of the refuse lands of the United States.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Anna Dubord, wife of Joseph Antonio de Reano, reported a bill to permit Anna Dubord to bring certain slaves into the State of Louisiana; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, entitled "An act to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports;" and, on motion, it was postponed till to-morrow.

On motion, by Mr. JACKSON, the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Mary James;" were discharged from the consideration thereof; and it was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the following bills, viz: A bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President to exchange five arpents of land on the south side of the public lot at Baton Rouge, for an equal quantity of land on the north side of said lot;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert S. Foreman;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William T. Nimmo;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The said three bills were severally read twice, by unanimous consent, and the first mentioned bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; the second mentioned bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and the last mentioned bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the managers on the part of the Senate, at the conference on the amendment of the Senate, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1824," reported:

That, having met the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, they have agreed to recommend—

That the Senate recede from their amendment to strike out the specifications for contingent expenses, and that the bill be amended as follows:

Insert, after the words "contingent expenses," in the 20th line, "accruing in the present year."

Line 42. After the word "service," insert "for per diem allowance to officers engaged in extra service, beyond the limit of their stations; for the purchase and repairs of steam and fire engines, and machinery; for expenses of burying deceased persons belonging to the navy; for taxes on navy yards and public property; and for accidents to the public vessels."

Line 43. After "whatever," strike out "one hundred and eighty thousand dollars," and insert "one hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars."

And also insert, "for contingent expenses for objects arising in the current year, and not hereinbefore enumerated, five thousand dollars."

The Senate proceeded to consider the report, and concurred therein, and the bill was amended accordingly.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the bill from the other House, "making appropriations for the fortifications of the United States, for the year 1824," was taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. VAN DYKE in the Chair.

Mr. SMITH stated, that the bill was in accordance with the estimates from the War Department, of the amount required for the fortifications during the next year; and he proceeded to show the grounds upon which those estimates were predicated.

Mr. RUGGLES said, he observed an appropriation in this bill for two new forts. He requested information in regard to the expense of the completion of these forts. He was not opposed to this appropriation, but wished to know the probable cost of the forts.

SENATE.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1824.

Mr. SMITH explained, and gave the information required.

Mr. CHANDLER thought the Government had enough to do to complete the fortifications which had already been commenced. He, therefore, moved to amend the bill by striking out so much of it as provides for the commencement of the two new forts.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, spoke of the general inaccuracy of estimates for fortifications; he thought the forts already constructed in Narragansett bay, were sufficient for protection; they had been found to be so during the late war, and he believed the Government ought not to commence such a great undertaking at present, as the construction of the fort on that bay.

The question was divided, and put first on striking out the appropriation for a new fortification at New York.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, was opposed to striking out this appropriation; he adverted to the policy of this Government, in regard to the defence of the country; he thought it of the first importance that New York should be protected, as being a very rich and valuable part of the country, and the first object of attack from a politic enemy; he was opposed to any interference with the plans proposed by the War Department, in regard to the fortifications; and hoped the appropriation would not be stricken out.

Mr. KING, of New York, said the contemplated work was no new one; it was for the protection of the Narrows, at New York. If this fort was not built, the work already established would be of very little or no importance. He said this was the only work that could be constructed for the defence of New York, and the city would be without proper defence if it was not done. Mr. K. called for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. RUGGLES said he should never object to the construction of any fortification which was required for the defence of the citizens or the commerce of the Atlantic States. He believed this fort, from the information he had obtained, was necessary. He spoke of the generous and liberal feelings which had been manifested by the gentleman from New York, in relation to the purchasers of public lands, and in other instances, and he thought the like liberality ought to be extended to him. Mr. R. only doubted whether the present was the best time to commence this work. He wished for some further information.

Mr. CHANDLER thought the present fortifications, with the force which could always be commanded at New York, was sufficient for the defence of the city, and he was not willing to vote any further appropriation for its defence.

Mr. KING, of New York, replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. SMITH made a few remarks in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. LOWRIE thought there could be but one opinion on this subject, if it were properly understood. He conceived this fortification to be highly necessary to the defence of New York. He only doubted as to the extent to which it ought to be carried. He rather thought the plan for this fort was too extensive.

Mr. SMITH gave some explanation, in answer to Mr. LOWRIE.

Mr. MACON wished to know the cost of this fortification, the number of men that would be required for it, &c. He did not wish to build a house without knowing the cost of it. He was aware of the importance of the city of New York, but there were other places that required protection, also, in time of war.

The question was then put, on striking out the appropriation for the fortification at New York, and decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Holmes of Maine, and Macon.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Bell, Benton, Brown, Clayton, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, H. Johnson, J. S. Johnston, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Mills, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Thomas, Van Buren, and Van Dyke.

The question was then on striking out the appropriation for the fortification on Narragansett bay.

Mr. SMITH spoke against striking out. The importance of this point, as a place of resort for our Navy, was exceeded by none in the Union. He was surprised that it had not received the attention of the Government before.

Mr. KNIGHT read the report from the Engineer department, showing the importance of fortifying this bay. He replied to the observations of the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) and went on to show the necessity of this fortification.

Mr. D'WOLF rose in opposition to the motion before the Senate; he said he was intimately acquainted with the waters of Narragansett bay, and he knew of no point in the country where fortifications would be more advantageous to the nation, as furnishing a means of protection to the people, and a place of safety to our commerce in time of war. Mr. D'W. explained the position on which it was contemplated to erect this fort, and the advantages that would result from its erection, as one of the most eligible maritime situations in the country, and as more susceptible of defence than almost any other.

Mr. CHANDLER withdrew his motion to strike out this appropriation.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, without amendment, and passed, to be read a third time.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, and by general consent, the bill had its third reading, and was passed.

WEDNESDAY, April 28.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Wheaton," reported it without amendment.

He also reported the bill, entitled "An act changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water course in the State of Mississippi or Territory of Arkansas," with an amendment.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported the bill from the other House, "for the relief of Mary James," without amendment. Mr. N. stated that the committee had instructed him to move the indefinite postponement of the bill, when it came up for consideration.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of David Giffin and Samuel Hoag," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize masters of vessels, in certain cases, to clear out, either at the custom-house of Petersburg, or that of Richmond," reported the same, with an amendment.

The following written Message was yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In conformity with a resolution of the Senate, of the 19th instant, requesting information whether the Executive, through the agency of the War Department, borrowed any money during the late war, under the condition of applying the same to the defence of the State wherein the said loans were made, to what amount, and whether interest was paid by the United States for such loans, &c.; I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War, containing all the information in that Department in relation to the resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

APRIL 27, 1824.

The Message and accompanying documents were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill to permit Anna Dubord to bring certain slaves into the State of Louisiana, was read the second time.

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of John Vanderlyn, reported a bill to authorize the painting of the battle of New Orleans by John Vanderlyn; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill in addition to an act establishing navy hospitals; and, on motion, it was postponed to Saturday next.

Mr. H. JOHNSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to the Senate, at their next session, the nearest practicable post route from New Orleans to Washington City.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to amend the judicial system of the United States, and provide for the holding of circuit courts; and, on motion, it was postponed to Saturday next.

Mr. SEYMOUR presented the petition of Pliny Moore, and others, owners and occupants of mills on the frontier of the State of New York, bordering on the Canada line, praying that persons residing on the Canada side may be exempted from the payment of the duty imposed on certain articles, when transported to said mills to be manufactured. The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. McILVAINE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Mims, deceased," and the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Arthur N. Henly," reported them, severally, without amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John Louderman;" "An act for the relief of Joseph Marechal;" "An act for the relief of Joseph Smith, of Alexandria;" "An act for the relief of Stephen Brace;" "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Bradford;" "An act for the relief of Thomas Williams;" "An act for the relief of Nathaniel Jones;" "An act for the relief of Benjamin Desobry;" "An act for the relief of Jonas Duncan;" "An act for the relief of John Wilmot;" "An act for the relief of Malachi Burns;" "An act for the relief of John Holliday;" "An act for the relief of Elliott Rucker;" "An act for the relief of William Hall, an invalid soldier of the Revolutionary Army;" "An act for the relief of Joshua Bennett;" "An act for the relief of Lemuel Arms;" "An act for the relief of Mareen Duval;" "An act for the relief of Samuel Rist;" "An act for the relief of the representative of Elijah Brush;" "An act to provide for repaying to Bazaleel Wells a certain sum of money by him erroneously paid into the Treasury;" and "An act for the relief of Charles Humphrey;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

REFUSE LANDS.

In pursuance of notice given yesterday, Mr. BENTON asked leave to introduce the following bill:

A bill to sell and dispose of the refuse lands belonging to the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the lands belonging to the United States, which have been heretofore, or shall be hereafter offered at public sale, and shall remain five years thereafter without being sold at the minimum price of one dollar twenty-five cents per acre, shall be again offered at public sale, but shall not be sold for a less sum than fifty cents per acre.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any head of a family, or young man above twenty-one years of age, or widow, being citizens of the United States, may demand and receive from the register and receiver of the proper land office a written permission to take possession of, and settle upon, any half quarter section of land which shall remain unsold, after having being offered for sale at the minimum price of fifty cents per acre, and upon inhabiting and cultivating the same for three successive years, shall be entitled to receive a patent therefor, as a donation from the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lands which shall remain unsold, after having been offered for sale at the minimum price of fifty cents per acre, may be sold at private sale for that sum, at any time before permission shall have been granted to settle on the same.

In asking leave to introduce this bill, Mr. BEN-RYON said, this was not the time to discuss it—probably the time would not come during the present session. In that event, what was done now would operate as a notice for the next session; would turn the minds of the Senators to the changes contemplated, and would prevent the necessity of delay. He believed that a change in the manner of selling public lands was called for, both by the voice of the people and the interest of the Government. By the present rule, said Mr. B., the good and the bad land are held at the same price. The best can be got for $1 25 per acre—the worst cannot be had for less. The minimum of $1 25 per acre for all sorts of land was arbitrary and unjust. It was unjust to the people, because it prevented them from getting the inferior land at a fair price; unjust to the States, because it checked their population, and deprived them of their right of taxation; unjust to the nation, because it prevented the public Treasury from receiving the money which such land was worth, and for which it would sell. The continuance of the rule would give to the United States the fabled position of the dog and the manger. The rule should be changed. The United States is a great land seller, and she should follow the practice of all other sellers; she should apportion her price to the quality of her land. When a quarter section has been offered for years at $1 25 per acre, and nobody will give that sum, it is proof that it is not worth it, and justice to the people, the States, and the Treasury, requires that it should be offered again at a less price. The bill introduced assumes fifty cents per acre, as the second minimum at which such lands should be offered; and it proposes to give away, without price, to such poor persons as may be willing to take and cultivate them, the refuse lands which will not sell for that sum.

The leave was given to introduce the bill, which was read, and ordered to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate then proceeded to consider, in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports, together with the amendments proposed thereto by the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures of the Senate.

The first question was upon agreeing to the insertion of the following proviso:

"Provided, also, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to, or be enforced against, importations of goods from ports or places eastward of Cape Good Hope, or beyond Cape Horn, before the first of November next ensuing."

Mr. DICKERSON and Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, explained the object of the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The other amendments proposed by the committee are, to change the duty on "quills," from "one dollar per thousand," and insert "twenty-five per centum, ad valorem;" to change the duty on "slates and tiles, for building," from half a cent each "to twenty-five per centum, ad valorem;" to strike out the contemplated duties on filberts, pine apples, oranges, lemons, and limes; to impose "on all window glass imported in plates, uncut," the highest rate of duties imposed by this act, on any imported window glass; to insert the following exception—"except patent adhesive felt for covering of ships' bottoms, which shall be admitted, free of duty, until June 30, 1826."

These amendments were severally explained by Messrs. DICKERSON and LLOYD, of Massachusetts; and were all agreed to by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLS then moved to amend the bill by striking out the following clause: "On iron, in bars or bolts, not manufactured, in whole or in part, by rolling, ninety cents per hundred and twelve pounds weight."

Mr. MILLS supported his amendment at considerable length, by showing the great importance of this article to all classes of the community, from the humblest laborer up to the planter and the merchant, to the commerce and navigation, and to the manufacturer, as well as others, and commented upon the impolicy of imposing a higher duty upon an article of such absolute necessity to the country, and to produce which, in such quantities as to meet the consumption of the country, it was, as he thought, utterly incompetent.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that he was not sorry that the enemies of the tariff had selected iron as the first article of attack, because, if there is any part of the bill that will stand the test, it is this—and because the fate of the bill depends very much upon our success or failure in this particular.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MILLS) has informed us that we ought not to lay heavy duties upon an article of indispensable necessity to us for our defence in war—an article of general use at all times, and without which we cannot even procure our food. But these are precisely the reasons in favor of protecting the manufacture of iron, of securing it to ourselves. Shall we unnecessarily depend upon foreign nations, three or four thousand miles distant from us, for articles absolutely necessary for our defence or our existence?

We have the means of making as much iron as we want for our own consumption, and as much more for exportation.

Our mountains are filled with rich veins of magnetic iron ore. The streams suitable for iron works are abundant—the mountains are covered with wood, large portions of which are unfit for cultivation.

APRIL, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

SENATE.

Our immense tracts of alluvial soil, also, abound with iron ore, and wood—the advantages of which will be lost to the country if the manufacture of iron is not protected. There is no mineral so universally distributed over this country as iron; and it is believed that there is not a State in the Union, in which this article could not be found, in sufficient quantities for the consumption of the State.

The manufacture of iron in all its details, requires a great number of laborers. If protected in this country, it would draw a large population from agriculture, in which too many are engaged. This portion of our population would immediately become the purchasers and not the sellers of the produce of the soil, and thus enhance the value of real estate, and afford a better interest for capital and profit for labor employed in agriculture.

The mining districts of Europe have, for ages past, furnished the best troops that have fought their battles—need I mention Dalecarlia?

The laborious and hazardous life of the miners amidst constant explosions of gunpowder, peculiarly fit them for the hardships and dangers of war; their business is intimately connected with that of the engineering department—they are sappers and miners by profession. Those engaged in the furnaces and forges are equally hardy and laborious. During the Revolutionary as well as the late war, our best soldiers were recruited in our mining districts.

Our navigating interest has been peculiarly favored, because it affords a nursery for seamen, who may be wanted for the defence of the country. But it was more difficult, during the late war, to find soldiers for our army, than seamen for our navy.

In the manufacture of iron little is done by machinery, but nearly all by manual labor; it therefore requires more protection than the manufacture of cotton or woollen goods; yet it has received much less. Indeed, in 1816, there seemed to be a determined disposition in Congress to abandon this important branch of business to destruction. Mr. Dallas had recommended a duty of seventy-five cents per hundred weight, or fifteen dollars per ton, on hammered bar iron. Some members of the House of Representatives, who knew that our iron works could not be sustained under such a duty, made an effort to increase it; that failing, a motion was made to reduce the duty from seventy-five to forty-five cents per hundred weight, which was adopted; and which carried ruin to more than three-fourths of all the iron masters in the United States.

During the late war, we manufactured four-fifths of all the iron consumed in the United States. In 1817, we manufactured two-thirds; and in 1823, one-third of all consumed in the United States; in six years more the manufacture of iron, if no further protection shall be given, will be as completely abandoned as the manufacture of earthen ware has been since the late war, which will be an immense loss to the country; but the shipping merchants will gain the freight on fifteen or sixteen thousand tons of iron a year, at about eight dollars per ton—giving them a real profit perhaps of about three dollars per ton.

In the session of 1817-'18, to save our forges and furnaces from immediate destruction, the House of Representatives passed a bill for raising the duty on bar iron to twenty dollars per ton. In the Senate, it was reduced to fifteen dollars per ton, its present rate. This was an advance of six dollars per ton. It was then said that this duty would add six dollars per ton, on iron, to the consumer; and that it would so far prevent the importation, as to diminish the revenue on this article. But what is the fact? The price of iron has not increased from that time to this; on the contrary, it is lower now than it was then; and the importation has constantly increased, and with it, the revenue.

It is a mistake to suppose that an article must increase in price in proportion to the amount of duty put upon its importation. That would be true as to articles, not of the produce or manufacture of the country, as coffee, tea, or silks, but not so with respect to those produced or manufactured at home. When the increased duty was laid upon iron, it produced a new struggle between the foreign and domestic manufacturer for our market, and that struggle has been pursued with so much obstinacy, as absolutely to reduce the price. This has been the case with a variety of other manufactures, and will continue to be the case, until our manufacturers gain the ascendancy, and then the domestic competition will keep the prices so low as to afford no more than a reasonable profit to the manufacturer. Should the duty be now increased three dollars per ton on iron, the effect will not be to increase the price of iron by that amount, for the foreign manufacturer will still struggle for our market, and give up a part of his profits rather than yield it. It will probably increase the price of iron at the rate of one dollar and fifty cents per ton, yet, if the foreign manufacturers persevere in their plan of driving our own manufacturers from our own market, they must continue to sell their iron at as low a rate as they now do, the duty notwithstanding, and this they will do till the trade shall be ruinous to themselves.

When the duty upon iron was raised to fifteen dollars per ton, it was predicted that the revenue upon this article would diminish. The reverse has been the case.

In 1817, the duties upon hammered bar iron, exclusive of the drawback, amounted to $154,315. In 1818, the first year of the increased duty, it amounted to $208,950. In 1819, to $242,394. In 1820, to $292,877. In 1821, to $230,413. In 1822, to $398,641; and in 1823, to $435,210. The whole quantity of bar iron, imported for home consumption, including the rolled bar iron, upon which the rate of duty was not altered, amounted, in 1817, to 16,839 tons; in 1818, to 16,640 tons; in 1819, to 18,755 tons; in 1820, to 22,505 tons; in 1821, to 17,654 tons; in 1822, to 29,352 tons; in 1823, to 33,787 tons. This last quantity cost us $1,829,000, besides freight and other charges. The bar iron we have imported for the last six years has cost us, upon an average, one million four hundred thousand dollars a year.

Within the last six years, we have imported, of hammered bar iron, 120,387 tons. The increased duty of six dollars per ton on that quantity amounts to $722,322, saved to the Treasury; and, as the price of iron has not raised, this increased duty has, no part of it, come from the pocket of the consumer, but has been entirely paid by the foreign manufacturer. Such has been the effect of the act of 1818, increasing the duty upon iron, and which was strenuously opposed, in part no doubt from an apprehension that it might possibly diminish the business of the importing merchant.

The quantity of rolled bar iron imported in six years, for home consumption, amounts to 17,704 tons, which, with the hammered, amounts to 138,091 tons. Suppose the whole of this sum to be manufactured in the United States; at $75 per ton, it would amount to $10,356,555, or to $1,726,092 a year, which, at the usual rate of wages in districts where iron is made, would employ at least eleven thousand laboring men, who would otherwise be principally engaged in agriculture; and these laboring men, with their families, would consume, of the produce of agriculture, to an amount of more than half a million of dollars a year, and thus, from being the competitors, become the most valuable customers of the farmers.

But suppose the whole of this iron to be imported from Russia and Sweden, as is nearly the case, who take in exchange nothing of our produce, except a small quantity of oak bark, rice, cotton, and tobacco. The whole that the iron costs us, except the price of freight, is paid to support the manufactures and the agriculture of Russia and Sweden. The freight, at eight dollars per ton, would probably give constant employment to five hundred men, and a profit on the freight, to the importing merchant, of three dollars per ton; and this trifling interest of the seaport towns, is to preponderate against the immense interest of the interior of the country.

In 1816, it was ascertained that we consumed about 50,000 tons of bar iron, annually. From the little encouragement given to any business requiring the consumption of iron, the quantity has not much increased, nor has it probably diminished—it may still be estimated at that quantity. In 1818, the quantity imported was 16,640 tons—much less than one-third of the whole amount consumed. In 1823, the quantity imported was 33,787 tons—considerably more than two-thirds of the whole consumption. During this ruinous process, by which our manufacture of iron has been thus reduced, many establishments for making iron have been abandoned, their owners ruined, and more than ten thousand laborers, engaged at those establishments, have been driven to seek other employment; they have generally resorted to agriculture, as a business by which they could at least gain a subsistence. Nothing but the greatest distress will induce men to abandon a business in which they have long been engaged, without a prospect of gaining any thing more than a bare subsistence by the change. And nothing but ruin will induce men to abandon the works in which their capital is invested, which cannot be abandoned without the loss of that capital.

As an object of revenue, none can be more fair than the duty upon iron. It would fall upon the different classes of society very much in proportion to their wealth; and iron is an article that cannot be smuggled.

But we are warned not to increase the duty upon iron, because it will increase the expense of building ships, while it will take from navigation a portion of its employment.

Why is the navigating interest to be particularly favored at the expense of agriculture and manufactures? The coasting trade is secured to our own citizens, to the entire exclusion of foreigners; and such has been the protection extended to our navigation engaged in foreign trade, that, of the tonnage engaged in that trade between us and all the world, nine-tenths is American. The merchants and ship owners are therefore enabled to levy the duties they may pay upon the construction of their ships, upon the consumer of the articles imported from abroad, and transported coastwise. From the answers of the Mercantile Society of New York, which appear in Mr. Baldwin's report of January 15th 1821, it appears that a British ship of 300 tons equipped for sea, will cost $24,000, or eighty dollars per ton; while an American ship of the same quality will cost $18,000, or sixty dollars per ton. This is an advantage that will always enable us to compete successfully with the shipping interest of Great Britain.

They state, further, that it will require four tons of iron, fifteen hundred pounds of copper bolts, four and a half tons of cordage, and twenty bolts of duck to the one hundred tons of shipping. How far will this increased duty of three dollars per ton on bar iron oppress the navigating interest? Suppose the duty should increase the price of iron to the full amount of it, (which it would not do,) this would amount to twelve dollars for a ship of one hundred tons. If she should last fifteen years, this would be a tax of eighty cents a year, and certainly would not sink the ships.

The copper used in shipping is now duty free. The shipping interest ought to be protected, but, in doing this, we should be careful not to oppress other important branches of industry.

It is said, the duty upon iron, as well as hemp, will take from navigation a portion of its employment. This is, indeed, the formidable objection to laying protecting duties upon those articles. It is an array of the small portion of our shipping, engaged in importing hemp and iron from the Baltic, which we do not want, against the great agricultural and manufacturing interests of this country, which should be employed in producing and manufacturing those articles. The freight on these articles, trifling as it comparatively is, is that to which all others must yield. This was well exemplified in the tariff bill of 1816, in which the shipping interest was particularly provided for. Hoop or slit iron is worth 20 per cent. more than it is in bars. A duty of no more than 45 cents per hundred weight, or nine dollars per ton, was imposed upon hammered bar iron, which would not prevent its importation, while a duty of fifty dollars per ton was laid upon hoop or slit iron. Iron in bars pays as much freight as in hoops or rods, and the shippers were willing to prohibit the latter, so that they might secure the freight upon the former. What is our trade to the Baltic? I will examine that with Russia—that with Sweden is nearly of the same character.

In the year ending the 30th of September 1823, we imported from Russia, to the amount of $2,191,474 in articles, nearly the whole of which we ought to produce or manufacture for ourselves. They took of our produce in exchange to the amount of $51,635, and of the produce of foreign countries to the amount of $597,099, leaving a balance against us of $1,610,043, to be paid by drafts on Holland and other places, where there might be balances in our favor. This trade, in which the Russians do not take of our produce to the amount of one fortieth part of that we take of theirs, may be very beneficial to the merchant, but is highly injurious to the country, inasmuch as we import nothing from them that we ought not to produce for ourselves; these importations, therefore have a direct tendency to check the industry of our country, which is our only means of wealth and prosperity. The great charm of this trade is, that it is almost exclusively carried on in American shipping. There is a tacit understanding between our shippers and the dealers in hemp and iron on the Baltic, that the former will sacrifice the agricultural and manufacturing interest of this country, so far as they respect these articles, provided the latter will sacrifice the shipping interests of those countries, so far as this trade is concerned, which is indeed giving up much on our part, but very little on hers. The discontinuance of this trade, however beneficial to this country, will be considered as a most serious injury to the shipping interest, as no doubt the discontinuance of the importation of bricks from Europe was nearly a century ago, of which the buildings in our cities were then constructed, and of which we have yet some specimens of Dutch houses in New York and Albany, presenting their picturesque gable ends to the streets. The discovery that we could make bricks in this country, was no doubt considered as a serious injury to the shipping interest. The proposed duty upon iron, which will amount to eighteen dollars per ton, cannot be considered as an adequate protection of this article, but it may save from destruction that portion of our iron works which still remain, but which will soon disappear if the present motion shall succeed.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, supported the motion to strike out this duty. He proceeded to show the unjust and partial operation upon certain classes of the community, and replied to the arguments made use of by Mr. DICKERSON.

Mr. MILLS made some further remarks in reply to Mr. DICKERSON.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, also addressed the Senate in support of the motion of his colleague, and in answer to some of the positions taken by Mr. DICKERSON. He alluded to the advantages which the home manufacturers already possess over the importer of this article. He assigned the gratifying prosperity of our country as the principal reason that operated against the domestic production of iron. That reason was to be found in the advance price our labor bears over that of the degraded population of the part of Europe, where this article is produced; and the price of labor, he said, was a test of national prosperity. He remarked upon the encouragement which had been said, by the gentleman from New Jersey, to have been extended to the shipping interest of the country, and upon the retributive policy that would, probably, be adopted by foreign nations, if this bill were passed.

Mr. L. said that he conceived it to be the duty of the Government—it was the principle in which the Republic was founded—to encourage, as far as it could be done, the interests of the whole people—and, where there were divisions of interest, to look to the claims of the largest and most important part. He compared the relative importance to the country, of the shipping and commercial interests, and the great class of mechanics dependent on them, with the miners and makers of iron. He spoke of the embarrassments which the shipping interest already labored under, and proceeded to show that this bill, if passed, would go to impose additional, and far heavier, burdens upon them. He thought the bill ought to be rather entitled a bill to oppress the agricultural, to crush the commercial, and eventually to injure the manufacturing interests of the country; for, the reaction of the bill would probably be the most tremendous effect of it. The agricultural interest was the great and controlling interest, and when they once realized its effect, they would repeal it, and also prostrate every thing that had grown up under it.

Mr. L. spoke of the Russian trade, as one of the most advantageous which this country ever pursued. He denied, altogether, that there was a balance against us, in this trade, and proceeded to explain the course which had generally been pursued, in relation to it. If called up again, upon the bill now before the Senate, Mr. L. said, he should endeavor more fully to explain his reasons for believing that all the ideas of balances of trade against this country, founded on the custom-house returns, were the vain and visionary hallucinations of the minds of mere theorists.

Mr. DICKERSON replied to the argument that had been adduced against him. He recurred to the policy of England, in the protection of the articles of her domestic production. He denied that this duty on iron was materially to affect the commercial interest of this country; and proceeded to comment upon the nature of our trade with Russia. He denied that it was so beneficial to this country as had been contended by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He did not deny the benefits of commerce to the country; but he thought that commerce would not be injured, to any considerable extent, by this duty. He believed England was not insensible to the value of her commerce; and yet she encouraged her own manufactures. Mr. D. spoke of the bounties that had been paid, in this country, for the encouragement of the fisheries. He did not complain of this; he only wished gentlemen to recollect that some encouragement had been extended to the commercial interest. He called the attention of the Senate to the great number of petitions then on the table, both from agriculturists and manufacturers, praying the imposition of higher duties on imported iron.

Mr. D'WOLF spoke in favor of retaining this item in the bill. He recurred to the general features of the bill, as intended for the encouragement of our domestic industry, and leading the people to do for themselves what they want done. This article was one great branch of the whole system included in the bill, and he thought the arguments of the gentlemen opposed to the duty only went to show its propriety. The home market, Mr. D'W. considered as the most important to every nation. The balance of trade, he said, ought certainly to be taken in the aggregate. If we sell to the other nations more than we buy from them, the balance, of course, is in our favor. He denied that other nations bought of us, because we bought of them: each nation bought what it wanted, and no more.

He compared the business of a nation to that of an individual. It was alike necessary for both to keep an account of what was coming in and going out. He knew that the commercial interests were languishing, and other interests were in the same situation. The facilities extended to the importation and use of foreign articles in this country were very great. He believed the interests of every State in the Union would eventually be promoted by the passage of this bill, as encouraging the industry of the country. The bill was intended to save the labor of the country, and throw it upon its own resources. As to the effect on the revenue, he considered it a mere bugbear, as the people, in some shape or other, must pay the revenue. The means they possess to pay it are of much more importance than the manner in which it is paid.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, denied, altogether, that any encouragement had been extended by the Government to the fisheries of the country. The bounty, he contended, was merely a drawback of the duty on salt.

The question on Mr. MILLS'S motion was then put, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Branch, Clayton, Edwards, Elliott, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Mills, Parrott, Smith, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Brown, Chandler, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Mc-

Irvine, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Seymour, Talbot of Indiana, Thomas, and Van Buren—23.

So the duty on iron was stricken out from the bill.

The Senate then adjourned.

M. C. Montgomery;" "An act for the relief of Solomon Sibley;" "An act for the relief of Mary H. Hawkins;" "An act for the relief of Thomas L. Moffitt;" "An act for the relief of Robert Strain;" and, "An act for the relief of Hugh McCulloch;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, directing the Postmaster General to report the most practicable post route from New Orleans to Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON, in explanation of the resolution, stated the importance to the State of Louisiana, and to the General Government, of a more direct post route from New Orleans to Washington City. Such a route might be established through the States of Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, which would not exceed in extent nine hundred miles. The extent of the present route through Tennessee, he believed to be nearly fifteen hundred miles. By establishing the route alluded to, the conveyance of the mails to and from New Orleans, would be facilitated, and the expense of the Government greatly diminished.

By an act of the present session, $30,000 was appropriated to enable the President to obtain surveys of different routes through the United States, for the purpose of internal improvement.

No route could be designated more important than the one he wished established, and he was persuaded the President would apply a portion of the sum alluded to to the accomplishment of the object in view. He wished now to call the attention of the Government to this subject, and hoped the survey of the route would be immediately made, and that the report required would be laid before Congress at the commencement of the next session.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports." Mr. KING, of Alabama, was called to the Chair.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill by striking out the following clause: "On hemp, two cents per pound."

Mr. LLOYD addressed the Senate in support of his motion. He expressed his high estimation for the gentlemen from Kentucky, and regretted that this motion would not, probably, meet their approbation. He proceeded to show the importance of this article, and the improbability of a sufficient production to meet the demand for consumption. He portrayed the course which had been pursued in regard to the agricultural interests of the Northern States. From their former embarrassed situation they had recovered, and had now become prosperous and happy, unaided by any extraordinary assistance by way of duties from the Government. He spoke particularly of the encouragement which had already been extended to the domestic growth of hemp, and the failure to produce it in any considerable quantity. Mr. L. adverted to the causes of this failure, and the want of the natural advantage necessary to the growth of this article. Even if Kentucky could raise the article in sufficient quantities with this enormous bounty to encourage the growth, he said, the cordage made from it would come higher than that of any other part of the world where it is made.

Mr. CHANDLER said he rose to give the reasons which would govern him in giving his vote on this question. He voted yesterday against striking out the article of iron, not because he would vote for the bill as it came from the House, which he could not do, but because he was willing to give an opportunity so to amend the bill, if possible, as to make it acceptable, and so as to bear equally on the several sections of the Union, and that each section may receive equal benefits; but, to give it this effect, the bill must undergo material changes. Not only the article of hemp, but of every species of duck and cordage, and of spirits, must be stricken out, or materially altered, before he could give his vote for the bill. He should vote for striking out the article of hemp.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that the subject before the Senate involved political considerations which had, on his mind, a greater influence than the combination of all others. Domestic industry, said Mr. J., renders us independent, as to foreign nations, for the necessities and comforts of life. It derives its greatest value from the fact that it fosters and secures the public liberty.

In vain may we look for such daring spirits to defend our invaded country as appeared on the plains of Chippewa, and seized the laurels of New Orleans, if that country be destined to remain dependent upon Powers confessedly hostile for the greater portion of what renders life convenient and honorable. In vain may we look for heroes willing to consecrate their hearts' blood to the service of their country, and for the vindication of its rights, if it must be their miserable destiny to be supplied only from foreign resources with the materials of defence.

It is high time, said Mr. J., to change the policy which we have pursued. The public voice loudly calls for it, and that voice deserves to be heard by the Representatives of the nation. We are addressed, indeed, in the ardent tone of pecuniary feeling, to allow the people to purchase merchandise where they can obtain it cheapest. Admit the propriety of this course: I feel myself at liberty, sir, to deny that the system which we have pursued has afforded us articles on the most moderate terms. Previous to the late war with Great Britain, and during the contest, our army and our navy were not only deficient in the comforts of clothing, when many of our citizens were not in a situation to construct them from the ample materials which our country supplies, but when merchandise of this description was found in our markets, the Government, as well as individuals, had to purchase them at the most extravagant prices, from four to ten times their ordinary current worth. It seems to me, sir, that we have improperly excluded from our dollar and cent calculation the effects which the policy of the late belligerent Powers of Europe produced upon our commerce and our articles of merchandise. We are now enjoying the blessings which the welcome calm of peace ever introduces. We can purchase the manufactures of Europe on terms perfectly moderate. But, alas! in correspondence with the erring tendencies of the human mind, we have forgotten British Orders in Council, French, Berlin, and Milan decrees, those interruptions of trade and confiscators of property, and are chanting ourselves to repose. We are crying peace, peace, when we know not how soon destruction may come upon us. The sound philosopher, the distinguished statesman, must not look on society in relation merely to the passing moment; his view of the interests of his country must alike involve retrospection and anticipation. Not only is he bound to promote the prosperity of the present generation—the interests of the future are confided to his charge. If such considerations be the result of sound policy, it becomes us to take into our calculation the melancholy examples which our Revolutionary struggles and the inconveniences of the late war exhibit. The losses and the sufferings of the nation, during those periods, for want of domestic manufactures, would alone furnish materials for a volume. That season of gloom and trial induced many of our enterprising citizens to invest capital to a prodigious amount in manufactures of the first necessity, and conducing to the comforts and conveniences of our countrymen. A valuable home market was created for the consumption of the productions of our soil, affording to the farmer the means of independence, and enabling him to obtain an equivalent for his labor, in the articles which he could not furnish himself.

By a return of peace those manufactories were most seriously injured. The immense capital that had been employed was rendered wholly unproductive by the inundation of the productions of foreign countries. Sir, the fact is obvious that, without adequate protection and support, our domestic fabric cannot compete with the foreign. Enterprising citizens must sustain injury, if not sink in ruin. We have an official return of a part of the capital vested in useful domestic manufactories in these United States. From this return, we find the capital employed amounts to from fifty to seventy-five millions of dollars. It is a solemn duty to inquire how far we are under obligations to our country and to the proprietors of this vast capital to avert the injury and desolation which the importing of foreign merchandise must produce.

We contend for free trade—we must have cheap purchases, and oppose all restriction upon our intercourse with foreign nations. Ruin is represented as in the train of consequences which are to follow the support of domestic manufacture. If the Powers of the earth constituted different branches of the same great commonwealth, bound together by similitude of feelings and principles, and universal peace were to attend this millennial condition of the human race, then, indeed, we might pronounce unnecessary all regulations relative to foreign commerce—all imposition of duties for the protection of home manufactures. We might then preach up the doctrines of Adam Smith, that commerce must regulate itself, and the best goods are to be gotten, at will, from the citizen and the stranger.

In this state of things our home market might be found in London or Liverpool, in Hamburg or Copenhagen, in Bremen or in Petersburg, in the East or the West Indies; as we now find it in our own happy country, in Boston or in New York, in Philadelphia or in Baltimore, in Charleston or in New Orleans. But where is the man whose credulity can anticipate such an Utopian result? It is the policy of nations to take care of themselves, and they everywhere adopt it. What is the design of the despots of Europe in forming their Holy Alliance, as it has been shamelessly denominated, but the support of their tottering thrones, and the suppression of that revolutionary spirit which, like the mild influence of Spring, is spreading among the people on every side. The ambition which divided unhappy Poland, some thirty years ago, among three of the European despotic Powers, has recently assumed a more formidable shape. It may be seen in the resolute exertion to crush the republican spirit of the Neapolitans, and the reduction of ill-fated Italy to absolute slavery. The ghost of tyranny is stalking, where once a generous Empire flourished, and where the banners of liberty waved to the wind, bold and beautiful. It may be seen in the effort made by France to reduce to unconditional submission to the will of a cruel tyrant, the independent yeomanry of Spain. It may be seen in the awful calm which has succeeded these convulsions. It is the treacherous and portentous calm of the ocean before the tempestuous swell of its angry surges; it is the alarming silence of the volcano, previous to its dire and desolating eruptions. To me, it is evident, from the history of Europe, for many centuries, and from the signs of the times, that the present appearance of European peace will be succeeded by internal and sanguinary wars. No sooner shall the thrones of Europe have sufficiently secured their own power, by degrading the minds of their subjects, and destroying the spirit of independence now spreading among them—and this they will effect, without some special interference of Divine Providence, for the conflict is unequal—than like Rome, at the periods of the triumviri, some master spirits will take the lead of the rest—some Marius and Sylla, some Pompey and Cæsar, some Antony or Augustus; the Holy Alliance will dissolve as thread at the touch of flame, and the Dividers of Europe will once more convert it into a field of blood. In this state of things we shall again be harassed by unjust decrees, and by resumed Orders in Council. We shall be thrown back suddenly upon resources of our own, without preparation to meet the exigence.

Our situation, Mr. President, may become more critical than the one which I have already supposed. When the Monarchs of Europe are assembled together, do you think that we are not a subject of their holy consultations? Do you not believe that we are viewed with an eye of jealousy? Can you suppose that, were they in a situation to do so, they would not compel us to change our happy Government and to take a King, perhaps of their own nominating, to reign over us? Let us, then, look to ourselves! Let us raise and confirm a system of our own, that we may live wholly independent of foreign supply, that we may transmit to our posterity that liberty and that happiness which the best feelings and blood of our ancestors have transmitted to us. When we die, let us have the consolation that we die in the full enjoyment of civil and religious freedom—that, from the wing of our eagle not a feather has been plucked—that we have preserved the bright inheritance for generations yet unborn. The principles which I have just stated are those which have the greatest influence on my mind in favor of the tariff.

Still farther, it is my decided conviction, that, in a few years, by a competition among our own manufacturers, we shall have the various articles we may want, where we raise the raw materials, in great abundance, cheap, and of excellent quality. The good effects are already self-evident, in relation to our coarse cottons and woollens. We are furnished with the domestic fabric cheaper, and of far better, because of far more substantial quality, in consequence of the duty imposed upon the foreign importation. The same results will be produced in every branch of manufacture where the raw material springs from our productive soil. Let the period of foreign restriction and home protection arrive, we may then, in accents of joy, pronounce ourselves blessed. Our independence will then, free as the air, bright as the orb of day, deserve the sacred name. As a nation, we are yet in our infancy. Forty-seven years only have elapsed since we dared to say—the colonies of America shall be free—that we would thenceforth regard the empires of the earth, in war our enemies, in peace friends. Yet, in consequence of our impoverishing policy, thousands, in different parts of our Union, are thrown out of employ, and are reduced to the necessity of starving, begging, or having their names enrolled on the poor list. Encourage domestic manufactures, and these unemployed people, whether old or young, boys or girls, will move along with songs of joy, in the ways of industry, and virtue. Sir, the moral habits, the frugality, the happiness of the people, are committed to our charge. That is a mere half-way legislation that parsimoniously, or with visionary systems, neglects them. Why should so many of our citizens be driven into the field, that, by ploughing and reaping, the home market may be glutted? Send your excess of flour and breadstuffs to England. The policy of that country will not permit you to sell these articles until the scarcity of her own crops menace her with famine. Waiting for that period, your flour is stored until it spoils on your hands. The merchant who has paid the farmer for his flour, has to wander over the seas, from port to port, to find a market. Alas! that market he too often seeks in vain. Suppose the merchant has procured, on credit, the breadstuffs which he vainly endeavors to vend or exchange in foreign ports. Unhappy man! What is his destiny? The bailiff, the dungeon, a miserable family, a broken heart, may teach us.

Notwithstanding all we know of foreign nations, and their policy, which always accords with a system of favoritism in relation to their own people, and to the direct disadvantage of foreigners, yet nothing will satisfy us but the placing of the citizen of our own country and the foreigner on an entire equality From such policy, Good Lord deliver us!

In relation to the opposition made against this tariff upon the principle that one part of our country is injured and another benefited, I said Mr. J., have only to say, that, in my deliberate judgment, the whole is founded upon great, national, and magnanimous principles. Time will demonstrate its beneficial influence in every part of the country. Sir, it will draw the people of these States into a closer union. It will teach us to depend, under the blessing of Heaven, upon our own vast resources, and will produce among the States a delightful and generous interchange of commercial intercourse. Congress alone has the power to regulate the trade of the States with each other. This duty has been deplorably neglected. It is high time that we enter upon its faithful discharge.

The difficulty of internal transportation among us has been urged as a reason why we should procure our iron, our hemp, and our merchandise, generally, from Russia, from Sweden, from Great Britain, and other foreign parts. But, sir, this is an additional argument with me to protect home industry and to facilitate intercourse among the several States. We are blessed with immense rivers, having their sources in the interior of our country, and pouring themselves into our oceans from the northern extremity of Maine to the Gulf of Mexico. These rivers, in every direction, more or less approach, and sometimes, as if to provoke us to the pursuit of our best policy, actually interlock each other. If obstructions present themselves, let us remove them. Where canals are practicable, let them be formed. Where great connecting communications are too expensive for individual States, let the Federal Government afford every facility in its power. By such a course every valley would be exalted and every mountain and hill be laid low; the crooked places would be made straight, and the rough places plain. We should feel and act more than we do, as one great people. Sir, this nation is destined to become eminent in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. In our commercial and agricultural interests we already rank high—but a part of our population must and will pass into a manufacturing State. We are bound to afford to this class of our citizens substantial protection and aid. They must not be left to suffer and to perish. Your patronage will make their movement gradual, pleasant, and salutary. It will be the pass-word—Shibboleth—with which they will cross the waters of Jordan without impediment; it will be more; it will supply them with a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night. Without such aid you introduce our infant manufacturers into the valley of the shadow of death.

The subject is inexhaustible. So much has been said in detail, that I do not feel myself justifiable in protracting the debate. Yet, as the motion is to strike out the article relative to the protection which should be given to hemp, I consider it due to the people whom I have the honor of representing, to claim that protection in favor of this production, which is extended to other great staples of the United States. We want no local advantages, no extravagant support, no exclusive benefits; but we wish equality of rights, and a system founded upon the broad basis of national policy. In the growth of this latter article, it is well known that Kentucky alone is not interested. Certainly, we raise it in great abundance. We could supply a large portion of the United States, had we sufficient encouragement; but many other States have soil and climate well adapted to the culture of this important staple. It has been asserted, and not contradicted, that nine-tenths of it is imported from a distance of four thousand miles from Russia; when no man can deny that we have soil in abundance, and of the proper character, for supplying the whole market of the United States. And yet, sir, shocking as is the impolicy and absurdity of the measure, we prefer the growth of Russian hemp, rather than the encouragement of our own. Sir, I shall vote against the motion to strike out the duty on foreign hemp.

It is remarkable, that we should not concur in the course which alone can give us a home market, for the consumption of a great staple of our country, when in foreign countries we either find a glutted market, or no market at all. The truth is, that we commenced a system of supporting certain branches of domestic industry soon after the organization of the Federal Government; and, in every case, the protection has excluded foreign competition. By this system, we have secured to the navigating interest the whole of the coasting trade, and almost the whole of the commerce with distant nations. The same system has excluded from our ports foreign snuffs and manufactured tobacco; giving a complete monopoly to the home market. It is admitted that 3,500,000 of our population are interested in the cultivation of the soil, for the purpose of raising bread, meat, and other articles of subsistence; yet, with few exceptions, the productions of this great portion of our people are totally excluded from the European markets. In Great Britain, as I have already stated, they are never admitted, excepting when that country is threatened with extreme want and starvation. Our great staples, flour, tobacco, cotton, rice, all find glutted markets, and breadstuffs generally no market at all. It is well known that cotton is produced in the East and West Indies, in South America, and in Egypt, and exported thence to Great Britain; and that tobacco is the growth of the Crimea, and many other countries. Sir, before I sit down, allow me most solemnly, and in the name of the sacred honor and best interests of our country, to ask you whether, while we meet with the competition which I have stated, in foreign markets, it be not our duty, and has not become high time to secure the home market to ourselves?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, replied to Mr. JOHNSON. He said the object for which our fathers fought was to free their children from tyranny and oppressive taxation. This protection of one State against another was but a plan to rob one to enrich another. In relation to the depression of the surplus of our productions in foreign markets, this bill, Mr. T. said, was no protection against it. The price of those commodities could only be fixed by competition. The best protection to cotton-growers would be to admit foreign fabrics freely, and thereby create a general demand for the article. This protection to our own articles was merely a tribute to capitalists.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that he rose for the purpose of explanation only; to reconcile his present vote with one he was prepared, and would, doubtless, be called upon to give on the question under consideration. He was in favor of increasing the duty on hemp with a view of affording protection to its cultivation in this country. He was willing to vote for a liberal but reasonable increase. The one proposed by the bill he thought was not of that character. The present duty is thirty dollars a ton, the one contained in the bill is forty-four dollars and eighty cents per ton, making an increase of nearly fifty per centum. Mr. V. B. could not think that the cultivation of the article in question required for its protection so great an increase of the duty; nor would a due regard to the other great interests of the country admit of its imposition. If, therefore the motion of his friend from Massachusetts had been to strike out the rate of increase for the purpose of reducing it to a reasonable amount, Mr. V. B. would have voted for it. But his motion was not of that character. It was to strike the duty on-hemp out of the bill, to which he (Mr. V. B.) was opposed. Whilst, therefore, he would vote against striking out, he was prepared to reduce the duty contained in the bill to an amount which, in his best judgment, would be just and politic.

Mr. TALBOT, of Kentucky, addressed the Senate as follows:

I rise with much hesitation to make a few remarks on the question before the Senate, prompted by the strongest sense of its vital interest to the happiness and permanent prosperity, not only to the State whose interests I have the honor in part to represent, but to a large portion of the good people of the United States. Why the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, who has made this motion, has chosen, through the whole course of his remarks, to represent the duty imposed on this article as a Kentucky measure—as one in which she alone was interested, I am not able to conjecture. He surely cannot be ignorant that, whatever interest the representatives of that State may have taken, or with whatever zeal or warmth they may have advocated or embraced this measure of the profoundest interest to this country, in a national point of view, that it is not the sentiment of the love we bear for our State alone, or the regard we entertain for that great and interesting section of the Union from which we come, that has dictated our opinion, or the course we have pursued, or the warm sentiments of zeal with which we advocate, or desire to see it adopted by the councils of the nation. [Here Mr. LLOYD explained, by observing that he had not, in the course of his remarks, alluded to the State of Kentucky in any other sense, or with any other view, than that of personifying that portion of the Union which was more immediately interested in the cultivation of the article under consideration.] Mr. T. proceeded: I am entirely at a loss, Mr. President, to comprehend the application of the course of remark, or the historical details in which the honorable gentleman has indulged himself, in relation to the embarrassments of the people of Massachusetts, at a period so remote as that to which he alluded, (that immediately succeeding the Revolution;) of the debts contracted; of the replevin laws, and other dilatory measures adopted by the government of that State, to suspend, evade, or delay their payment; of the insurrection of the quiet and sober people of that pious and moral State, or of the prompt and decisive measures adopted for the suppression of this insurrection, by the aid of military force, the promptness of its application, or its complete success. As the honorable gentleman has made no application of this valuable historical sketch, I shall not detain the Senate in conjectures of what might have been insinuated; leaving to the good people of Massachusetts, for their own instruction, the valuable monitory hints which the honorable gentleman may have intended to convey from this retrospect of past errors and aberrations from the path of wisdom or of duty. It is true that the State of Kentucky, with some of her sisters of the West, has, for some years past, been laboring under the pressure of great embarrassments, resulting not from a defect of industry, in the cultivation of the fertile and productive soils with which Providence, in its kindness, had provided, and in which a happy destiny, had placed them. They are to be ascribed to habits of too free and profuse expenditure, into which they had been thoughtlessly induced, by the seductive temptations held out to them by their Eastern brethren of the Atlantic commercial cities; into the purchase of their imported luxuries, and the unlimited credits with which they were indulged for the payment of them, relying on the fruits of their industry, bestowed on one of the most fertile soils on earth, blessed with the smiles of Providence for the fulfilment, with good faith, of engagements thus imprudently made. These engagements would have been as faithfully fulfilled had the providence and wisdom of the councils of the nation interposed in furnishing protection; and, by that protection, afforded markets for the productive fruits of their industry and their labor.

This is but a faint and feeble sketch, Mr. President, of the general and leading causes which have led, within the few latter years of our history, not only to the embarrassments and distresses of the Western, but almost of every other portion of the interior sections of the Union, (the great mercantile cities of our Atlantic seacoast excepted.) And, in this distress, with the progressive depreciation in the price of property of all descriptions, resulting from the want of a sound circulating medium, and the deficiency of foreign markets for the agricultural productions of the industry of the country, is the wisdom, as well as the justice, of the councils of the nation, invoked by a much suffering community, for some measure of redress for such accumulated evils. And is there none within the competency of legislation to afford? Can, or will the General Government afford no adequate relief, by the extension of protecting duties on the importation of the productions of agriculture and the manufacturing industry of foreign nations to the distresses of our own? To these questions, the opponents of this bill, the advocates of the present motion, give an unqualified and unhesitating negative. Nay, they argue most strenuously against all impositions of duties on importations, laid with a view, or on the principle, of the protection of our domestic industry. Arguments, embracing within the scope of their operation and tendency, not only the increased duties proposed by the present bill, but all other duties which can be proposed, or which have heretofore, at any period been imposed with a view to such protection; with what propriety or consistency, a brief sketch, a hasty glance at such duties as have been imposed with this view, will be apparent.

Among the most prominent of the articles of agricultural growth, which, at the very commencement of our present Government, under our happy Constitution, received this Governmental aid, are those of cotton, the manufactures of tobacco and sugar—the last of which articles, although not grown at the period of the adoption of this duty, and therefore not within the scope of that protection intended to be afforded to the others, has, in effect, received all that protection and fostering care of the Government in the perpetuation of this duty, which it could have done had it been within the view of the policy which dictated those duties on cotton and tobacco. The continuance of such duty since the period of its adoption, with so much success to a portion of our acquired territory of Louisiana, is founded upon the same considerations of a wise and enlightened policy, which gave birth to the coequal imposition on those of tobacco and cotton, and entitles the other portions of the community, who do not participate in this rich and valuable production, to ask and expect from the growers of this, with the other enumerated articles, the same return of reciprocal good will, and a participation in the same advantages, by an extension of adequate protection in the cultivation of other agricultural productions peculiar to the other portions of our extensive and diversified soils and climates. That there is great distress prevailing in the agricultural classes of society, not only of the interior and Western States, but even in those of the Southern, heretofore engaged in a most profitable cultivation; that the foreign markets are glutted with the article of cotton, the result of which has been a continued and alarming depression in the price of this article; that the increased production of cotton, by its successful introduction in the Brazils, and in other portions of the recently emancipated provinces of South America, the luxuriant fertility of which, combined with the more auspicious and favored climates of our globe, by increasing the competition amongst the growers of this valuable staple in these States, tends not only to diminish the profits of our cultivation, by increased competition in the markets, but so to overstock it as to annihilate entirely the profits of the cultivation, to draw us from the cultivation, and to overwhelm, in irremediable ruin, those portions of our population whose prosperity essentially depends upon this staple article.

If these facts are recognised on all sides, and acknowledged by these cultivators themselves, the violent opposers of this bill, does it not behoove them to pause, and consider well whether they themselves have not a common interest with every portion of this Union in the encouragement of domestic manufactures, to increase and extend the home market for this staple article, by which the domestic consumption of the country will increase and extend, not only the domestic manufacture, but the consumption of this raw material, the uses of which are so rapidly extending themselves through all classes of society?

But it is objected, by the honorable gentleman who moves to strike out this item in the bill, that this article of hemp cannot be produced and dressed in such manner and in such quality as to answer for the purpose of rigging our merchant vessels; that, whatever may be the quality or capacity of the soil for its production, the length of the days, with the great warmth of the sun, in those parts of Russia where this article is cultivated, in which the sun is twenty-two hours above the horizon, is essential to the successful water-rotting of hemp, the only mode of preparing and curing this article which can fit and prepare it for the rigging of vessels; that the climate of Kentucky, unsuitable for this purpose, with the situation of its rivers, deeply imbedded, and flowing at great depths below the surface of the earth, with the fetid odor which exhales during this process of water-rotting, forbid all just expectation that Kentucky could ever produce, even with the protection of this bill, this article, of proper quality for the use of our marine or navy.

These objections, Mr. President, however specious, are founded in mistakes and misconceptions, as regards the capacity of the soil and climate of our country, compared with those of Russia, as well as in the capacities, the qualities, and resources, of our countrymen, to surmount any real difficulties which may present themselves. As respects the first, nature has not been so niggard of her gifts as the observations of the honorable gentleman would imply; for, I am still to learn, sir, if, indeed, the fact be so, that the country of the Ukraine, though blessed with a fertile soil and auspicious clime, well adapted to the successful cultivation of this important staple, and from which the importations of our foreign hemp are made, is endowed with any happy peculiarities for this purpose, with which the same munificent and Almighty hand has not spread its equal blessings on our Western climes; although the hand of industry and successful cultivation has as yet developed, but in a comparatively small degree, the capacities which they present to the hand of industry, of labor, and of art, under the cultivation of her hardy and industrious sons. And permit me to correct a mistake into which the limited information of the honorable gentleman, in relation to the topography of Kentucky, has betrayed him; for, though it is true that the river Kentucky, from which our State derives its name, is sunk from two to three hundred feet below the level of the adjacent land; the channel being lined in many parts with white marble cliffs, beautiful and romantic in a high degree; yet, it is equally true, and equally known to all who have any knowledge of the face and aspect of our State, that, in this extraordinary tract, this river is peculiar there, and that not only the rivers, but creeks, rills, and branches, from which supplies of water are to be collected in dams and ponds, which, combined with the Summer sun, which remains above the horizon only fifteen hours in our happy clime, is believed to be quite sufficient to produce the effect desired, such partial decomposition of the vegetable gluten of this important staple as fits it for the brake, and which, with the proper dressing, will produce the article possessed of all the properties requisite for the manufacturing, not only the cable, and other rigging, but sails for our merchant vessels, equal to even that of Russia, or any other portion of the globe.

But gentlemen speak of the capacity of the regions in which this article can be cultivated with success, as totally incompetent, in any reasonable degree, to supply the demand for our domestic market, and urge, in lamentable and desponding strains, the oppression, hardship, and distress, to which those engaged in the foreign commerce will be exposed, by being compelled to pay this enormous duty on Russia hemp. And, to give a darker shade to the coloring in which this oppression and distress is drawn, they represent this important interest in the nation, not only in a state of suffering and distress, but in the very throes of expiring agony, sinking under the neglect, if not expiring under the oppression, of governmental regulation.

That this interest is one of immense importance to the prosperity, the welfare, and greatness of the country, will be denied by none; but, that it has been permitted to suffer, to languish, or decay, by the neglect, or been oppressed by any acts of impolicy or injustice of the Government, is unequivocally denied. By what acts of legislation has this interest been oppressed? Not one has been pointed out, or even hinted at, by the opponents of the present bill. What acts of legislation, within the competency of the National Government, have not been passed for the encouragement, extension, and prosperity of the commerce and navigating interest of these States? Have not the acts regulating the coasting trade secured to the shipping interest a complete and exclusive monopoly of that extensive and valuable portion of the navigation embraced in the interests of internal commerce? a commerce which, from the vast extent of our territories, the diversity of soils, and climates, and productions; the agricultural and manufacturing industry of part ministering to the wants, the comforts, and enjoyments of the other; and thus furnishing, at present, and destined to furnish, in ages yet to come, a commercial intercourse between these States unknown and unparalleled in the history of the world. Are not the various navigation acts conferring exclusive advantages on American built and American owned ships modelled upon the famous navigation laws of England, built up and cherished by the wisdom of successive ages? Are these nothing? Do the laws imposing discriminating duties on the tonnage of foreign vessels, in favor of the navigation and importation of merchandise from abroad, insure no advantage to the owners of American vessels? And with what view, and for whose advantage, have the various measures of restriction, adopted by the American Government for the purpose of countervailing the unjust regulations imposed by foreign Governments, been introduced? And have not the ship owners of our own country, at least, participated in all the advantages received or anticipated by the introduction of those measures? But a ready answer can be given to all these questions. And that answer ought, at once and forever, to put to silence these unfounded imputations. But does this brief and hasty enumeration of laws, passed for the avowed and express purpose of the encouragement and protection of our shipping interest, embrace the whole? No. What was the great and primary object and policy of the American Government in rearing up a Naval Establishment, upon a great and extended scale, built and maintained at such great expenditure of the treasure of the nation? In part, to be sure, for the protection of our seacoast from the danger of invasion by foreign enemies—a danger future and contingent, and not greatly to be apprehended by a Government like our own, pacific, and essentially so in its very principles and organization—but constituting a species of force, at all times of the highest use and importance, in the protection of our foreign commerce from the piracies and robberies of professed depredators on the peaceful commerce of all the world, as well as from the rival pretensions and evident usurpations of civilized and social man.

For whose especial protection and advantage are the extensive chains of fortifications on the widely extended line of your Atlantic seacoast, if not for the possessions on land as well as of the commerce floating on the ocean from the Atlantic ports? And have the citizens of your interior or Western States any direct interest, at least in comparison with those of the inhabitants of these Atlantic States, in rearing and maintaining these great establishments? And yet has any of these States complained of these expenditures as burdensome or unjust towards them? Nay, have they not with cheerfulness, cordiality, and even zeal, contributed, not only their money, but, when called on by the voice of honor and of patriotism, lavished their blood as well as treasure in the defence of the nation's rights, outraged in its commercial rights on the ocean by the insolence and injustice of a foreign nation?

But let me not be misunderstood in the course of the remarks in which I have indulged myself, in reply to the honorable gentlemen who have uttered their complaints of the threatened ruin of our foreign commerce, and who would impute such ruin to the neglect of this important interest of the nation, on the part of its Government, whose duty it is to look with an impartial eye, and to attend with impartial care, to all the widespread interests of its people—a principle which the friends of this bill not only recognise, but the application of which they specially invoke to our aid in the adoption of the present measures, the main scope and object of which they aver to be the protection of the first and dearest interest of every independent nation—the encouragement and protection of the domestic industry of the country, as applied to its agriculture and manufactures, on the perfection of which so much of the happiness and prosperity of its citizens must always depend.

SENATE.

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

But to ascertain whether those engaged in foreign commerce are to be injuriously affected by the encouragement of domestic manufactures, which is held out in the present bill, it is proper to understand in what foreign commerce consists, and on what its existence and success depend. Is it more or less than an exchange of the surplus productions of the respective labors of our own, for those of foreign countries? I speak not of the carrying trade of the commerce of other nations, which every State engrosses to itself in time of peace. If foreign commerce, therefore, consists in this exchange of our own, for the commodities of other nations, to what extent can this commerce be carried on? And are not its limits to be found in the number, value, and amount, of the productions of your own home industry, which is the extent (to speak in general terms) of your means of acquiring, by this commerce of exchanges with foreign nations, the surplus of their productive labor? And if it is, what, I ask, emphatically, of those who represent the interests of the foreign merchants here, is the true interest of those concerned in navigation and foreign trade? And if it is not by offering incentives, by holding out inducements to our citizens to embark in new and profitable branches of manufactures, and to approach in some degree towards perfecting of those now begun—thus, by increasing the number and value of our commodities, for which a demand may be found in foreign markets (or even in our own) to increase and multiply the business of profitable exchange; and thus give new and additional employment for the mercantile classes, in effecting the exchanges of such new commodities, to increase and extend the navigation and commerce of our country with other nations, for the accommodation, and to the mutual profit and advantage of all concerned.

To honorable gentlemen who represent a portion of the agricultural interests, which are concerned in the cultivation of the great and important staples of cotton and tobacco, are there not arguments to be drawn from recent experience, combined with the immediate prosperity of the future, which ought to admonish them of the fatal effects which have and must result from the policy heretofore pursued, and to induce them to lend their suffrages and their aid in the adoption of the measures proposed by the present bill? To the cultivators of cotton, is it necessary to urge what they themselves admit—that the profits of this cultivation, formerly so productive, have not only decreased within the few past years, but at the present prices, has ceased to yield any profit whatever, on the capitals employed in its cultivation? Let me invite them to a retrospect of some five or six years past, and leave to their own serious reflections the melancholy prospects which it holds out to their future contemplation on this, to them, most interesting topic. Does not the history of this trade, for the last seven years, demonstrate that, with the increased extent of exportation of some 30,000,000 pounds of cotton in the year 1822, beyond that of the preceding year, the English markets for this article became so overstocked as to reduce the price to the loss of several millions to the exporters—thus exhibiting the melancholy fact of the increase of cultivation, of industry, labor, and capital, bestowed on the cultivation, resulting in diminished profit, if not ruin, to the planters, as well as to the exporters; and ultimately, in a national point of view, in poverty and ruin to the country? Is there no remedy for this actual as well as anticipated evil, to spring from the causes which have been enumerated? And where is such remedy to be found, if it is not in the policy which has given birth to the measure now under consideration? And that is, to improve the condition of the agriculturist, by affording an increase of the home market, by increasing the domestic manufacture of this raw material. This will extend the market, and the demand for the commodity; and thus relieve the planter from the present pressure, arising from insufficient or glutted markets, by the consumption of their productions, by the persons thus profitably employed in manufacturing establishments, who must be fed and supported by the labors of the cultivator.

To the sections of our country engaged in the cultivation of tobacco, the same arguments apply, with accumulated force. And in this article the State from which I come, and which I have the honor in part to represent, have an interest in common with our brethren of Virginia, Maryland, and North Carolina. The total of the European demand for this great staple of the industry of these States, is 60,000 to 70,000 hogsheads per annum. A quantity so far from affording encouragement for the cultivation of the article, or competition in the foreign market, I will venture to affirm the labor and industry of Kentucky, were an adequate inducement offered, would, without a very extraordinary effort, furnish in any given year. As a decisive proof that this limited and insufficient market is overstocked, not only the low price of the article, of the ordinary qualities, in the foreign as well as the domestic market, of which we are all melancholy witnesses, but the intelligence from abroad, that the markets of London, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam, to which this article is transported from our own ports, are not only overstocked, but supplied, upon an average of something like one year's supply, in anticipation. So that even the exporters of the last year's crop have no prospect of obtaining a market at even the lowest price.

To the cultivators of wheat, or the manufacturer of flour and of other breadstuffs, no better prospect of a profitable market presents itself; but one, still more melancholy, if possible, of future profitable market, or even any market, for these articles, which were at one time, (when the armies of all Europe were to be fed by neutral America,) the great and preferable staples of some of the Northern and Middle, and even of the Western States. Most of the kingdoms of commercial Europe now cultivate the whole or greater portion of these articles, which are required for the support of their respective population; and England, a country which, under the influence of a system of liberal exchanges, on terms of mutual advantage, should have furnished a market for all the surplus of these articles, by the monopoly in favor of her own domestic agriculture, has, by the operation of her corn laws, excluded them from her ports. A system of exclusion so rigid, as not to admit of relaxation, except when the prospect of scanty and insufficient crops at home presents to her numerous population the horrors of famine, or the picture of distress so immediate and alarming, as to admit of no alternative.

With prospects so appalling to the future efforts of the industrious and laboring farmer and the enterprising merchant; with no prospect of remuneration for the labors of the one, or the enterprises of the other; whither shall we turn, Mr. President, for consolation or redress? If it is not to be found in the measure before us, will the opponents of the bill point out some other which can rouse our desponding countrymen from the torpor into which these discouraging prospects have plunged them? Which can nerve the arm of the farmer; and revive the drooping spirits of the manufacturer? It behooves them to answer.

But to return to the article immediately under the consideration of the Senate. It is conceded to honorable gentlemen, who advocate the motion to strike the proposed duty imposed on foreign hemp from this bill, that the duty imposed on this article by the act of 1816, which is thirty dollars per ton, was of itself sufficiently onerous on the ship builders, who were obliged to employ large quantities of it in the rigging and equipping of their vessels. A supply to which the hemp growers in the United States, are entirely incompetent; that the article cannot be produced in Kentucky or the other Western States, of the proper quality essential in the manufacture of cables, sail-cloth, and the other rigging for a vessel; that the protection enjoyed under the act of 1816, was altogether sufficient to have called the industry and energies of the citizens of these States into complete and active operation; and had tested and ascertained the total incompetency of the Western States to engage with success in this cultivation.

Were these objections bottomed on sufficient data, well ascertained to warrant the inferences thus rashly and hastily drawn, from this hasty and superficial view of the question, it would afford matter for the most melancholy reflection and direful foreboding to the future prospects of the people of this interesting portion of the Union. If it were true, indeed, that the beneficence of a kind and bountiful Providence has placed them in the West and middle regions of this immense continent; blessed with a soil fertile and luxuriant, perhaps beyond that of any other of equal extent on the surface of the globe,—if this article of production, of all others, requires the aids which such soils alone can furnish, and to the perfection of which such climates are most happily adapted, what cause is there to despair of success, in producing most ample supplies? But, not only does this view of our country, in her gifts of soil and climate, refute the bold and unauthorized assumption, as well as the uncharitable and unauthorized conclusion, but experience, though a brief one, furnished by the last war, of three years' duration, adds the testimony of her unerring dictates to refute such reasoning. A period during which, short as it was, exhibited in the State of Kentucky, under the influence of the double duties imposed during its continuance, united with the other embarrassments in our commercial intercourse with foreign nations, contributed to produce a rapid and successful increase, not only in the cultivation of the raw material, but in the manufacture of the coarser kinds, such as twine or spun-yarns, bagging, and bale rope, to a great and profitable extent; tending greatly to the increase, not only of the industrious labors of the farmer and manufacturer of the State itself, but of our neighbors; furnishing a mutually profitable commercial barter of these commodities, for those which they could furnish us in exchange. But, with the return of peace, the smiles of which brought happiness and prosperity—the usual concomitants of its happy reign, to most of the other regions of our Union; with the cessation of these double duties came ruin and destruction to this young but rapidly increasing cultivation, and to these manufactures, which time had not yet sufficed to bring to maturity or perfection; and these flourishing manufactures, our ropewalks, our factories for cotton bagging, bale rope, and twine, vanished like the baseless fabric of a vision, leaving but the wrecks behind, over which the owner was left to mourn. That this cultivation, and the manufacture of the raw material, have ever since languished and declined, will not be denied, and the causes of both have been explained.

And who will infer from this a total incapacity in the country, in the soil, or the climate; or those who inhabit the one or the other, to bring them to a degree of perfection which will afford the most ample supplies, to suffice, at no distant day, for the domestic supply of this raw material of hemp, adequate to the demand of our people; but for the equipment of the vessels engaged in our merchant service, as well as for the Navy of the United States? But it is because the cultivation is not yet well established; and because the manufacture of the article is yet comparatively in its infant state, that it requires the protection and the fostering hand of a parental government, to bring it into successful operation. It is because, in a land of liberty like ours, where every citizen has an unbounded range in his choice of occupation; where, of consequence, the force of habit, and even prejudice, in relation to these pursuits, is so inveterate and unyielding, that the gently guiding hand of a parental government should interfere, to effect that gradual change from an unprofitable pursuit to one that is gainful. This an arbitrary government, like that of Russia, can produce at once; an imperial ukase can convert every peasant and serf in the Ukraine, as by the touch of an enchanter's wand, into a grower of hemp; and every subject, where each subject is a slave, into a spinner or weaver of this article into Russia duck or Russia sheetings. This is the liberal policy of a wise and enlightened government, Mr. President; and it is upon this principle, just and politic as it is liberal and enlightened, on which this bill is framed and supported by its advocates; not upon the local selfish views of sectional policy, dictated by selfish and unsocial feelings, as has been, without just foundation, asserted by the opponents of the measure.

It is upon these principles of an enlightened legislation, and of a Government beneficent and paternal, that Henry IV., influenced in an unenlightened age, by the enlightened wisdom of a Colbert and a Sully; that the Edwards of England, advancing before the ages in which they lived and reigned, and outstripping the tardy pace of the improvement of the people whom they were called to govern, by prohibitory duties on foreign importations, by bounties and protections, granted to the subjects of their own dominions the manufacturing of such fabrics as were suited to their interests and their wants. This policy has been persevered in by the wisdom of those Governments, until the present age, by which the manufactures of England, in particular, have obtained, under the fostering care of their Parliament, assisted by their boards of trade, a degree of perfection which has constituted, in a high degree, the wealth and prosperity of the nation, and been the admiration and the envy of the world.

Nay, so far has this protecting policy of the British Government been carried, in times of difficulty and distress, in which her manufactures have been involved by the pressure of extraordinary circumstances, that loans of large amounts have been made from the Treasury, to support manufacturers, tottering on the brink of bankruptcy and ruin. Examples of this are to be found in the conduct of this Government in the years 1817 and 1819, when losses, to an immense amount, by the excessive importations of their merchants to this country, at the conclusion of our last war, was relieved by large issues and loans of exchequer bills. A similar policy had been pursued some half century before the period I have just alluded to, by the immortal Frederick, for the purpose of introducing profitable manufactures in his newly acquired province of Silesia—a policy which, if it did not justify the wars and conquests by which this and other provinces had been acquired by this accomplished monarch, must tend greatly to diminish the horrors and calamities which war and conquest usually carry in their train.

But, let me not be misapprehended, as if I were recommending this form of protection and encouragement to the enlightened body I have the honor to address. The advance of money, or other loans, if within the legitimate powers, would not be within the scope of the policy which, in our age and country, should be pursued. But a system of duties framed upon a full and impartial view of all our various interests, which, neither excessive or oppressive in their amount or in their operation, and without bearing with an unreasonable or ruinous pressure on the other great interests of the nation, would gradually tend to develop, and to bring into full operation, all the capabilities of our soils and climates. This would stimulate the ingenuity and talents of our various population, in the rearing up, and bringing to maturity, and perfection, the various manufacturing and mechanic arts, of which our country and our people are susceptible. This should be the wish of every patriot heart, and the counsel of every liberal and enlightened statesman.

When Mr. TALBOT had concluded—

Mr. SMITH said, that a stranger would suppose, from the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, that no encouragement whatever had been extended to our manufactures. He, himself, had always advocated such duties as would extend them reasonable encouragement. He proceeded to show what had been the course of the Government on this point. The tariff of 1816, he said, had been bottomed upon this principle. That tariff increased the duty on hemp, but the growth had diminished since that time; nor did he believe it would be grown, even with the encouragement proposed in this bill. Not a ton less of foreign hemp would be imported. This bill was intended, not for revenue, but exclusively for the protection of manufactures. The shipping interest was embarrassed, but it asked no aid from the Government; it only wished not to be still further depressed. Every article of consumption, he said, had risen fifty per cent. since the Revolution—principally in consequence of duties levied by the Government. It had raised the prices of articles of necessity and of labor. He spoke of the duty on manufactured tobacco—it did no good, he said, to the growers of that article—it was intended for the manufacturers. The object of the duty on sugar was revenue—it was one of the best articles to produce revenue. He alluded to the ideas of balances of trade—if taken at all, they should certainly be taken in the aggregate. He thought the balance of trade was not generally understood—gentlemen had said the balance must be paid in money. Was there any money exported from the country? Not much, he believed, except in the Indian trade; and that found its way into the country again. Mr. S. spoke of some parts of our trade which produced valuable cargoes of imports, for very small ones of exports.

The Tariff Bill.

SENATE.

He referred to the course of European nations on this subject, and to the policy of the retaliatory systems of protection, which had been adopted by those nations, one against the other. They were abandoning those systems as fast as possible; it was more difficult to get rid of them than to adopt them; and, at the very moment they were relinquishing the system, we were about to take it up. He explained the embarrassments which had taken place from want of knowledge and capital, in carrying on the business of manufacturing, and alluded to some of those which had flourished, which were in possession of those advantages. A rational encouragement to manufactures, Mr. S. said, he was always willing to advocate, but he believed that neither Hamilton, at the time he submitted his celebrated report, nor any other man, at that time, had dreamed of extending such great encouragement to manufactures, as had already been extended to them. He believed the present duties were sufficiently high, and quite as high as the people ought to be burdened with. Mr. S. replied to Mr. TALBOT's remark about the fortifications of the Atlantic frontier, and to that respecting the protection of cotton; he knew of none that it had received from the Government. The cotton growers only wished to be let alone. He explained the heavy operation which the bill would have upon the Southern States.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, wished all mankind was afflicted with the same distresses as the people of Kentucky. They have a fine climate and soil, and a great surplus of the productions of the earth; not so, he said, with the people of Maine—they have to work hard, and get but little produce for it. And now they are to be taxed by this bill to find a market for the Kentucky hemp; he explained the course which the article had taken in this country. A great deal had been said of domestic industry—he believed the industry of seamen and fishermen was domestic industry. The gentleman from Kentucky had said that the duty was not prohibitory; they are willing not quite, but almost, to prohibit an article, scarcely a ton of which do they now produce. He denied all the positions which had been taken in relation to the balance of trade—nobody, he said, could understand it. It had been millions against us ever since he could recollect. The property had always been going out of the country; and what is the proof of this doctrine? He asked, if the proof was to be sought in the growing prosperity of the country, and the absolute accumulation of millions every year? He asked if the Navy, of which the gentleman from Kentucky had spoken, was peculiarly the property of the East? If the West had no protection to seek from it? As to the fortifications, almost all that had been made since he had been in Congress had been for the protection of the West. The principal one of the East had been erected before the establishment of this Government. And, upon these grounds we are asked to impose a duty of forty-five per cent. on an article which we do not yet produce at all. Mr. H. thought this one of the most extravagant items in this most extravagant bill.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, made some further observations in exposition of the fallacy of all arguments upon the balance of trade, as taken from the custom-house returns. The reporter could not hear Mr. L. with sufficient distinctness to report even a sketch of his remarks.

Mr. RUGGLES said this was framed, he believed, as a bill for the general encouragement of all branches of the manufactures of the country. He believed this item would not be as injurious to the Atlantic States as they seemed to imagine; he went on to show why it would not have so bad a tendency, as was supposed; he thought that, at least, the advantage of furnishing the article for the Navy, and for the coasting trade, ought to be accorded to the Western States. He commented upon the advantages they possessed for the growth of this article, and the great benefits that would be derived to the country from its production. He could not believe the difference between the foreign and domestic article so great as to warrant the rise of the foreign article to the entire exclusion of the domestic.

Mr. EATON believed every gentleman had made up his mind on this subject, but he deemed it his duty to express his opinion in a few words. He admitted the positions taken in regard to certain branches of our trade, wherein there were very small exports and increased imports. But, he contended that the balance of trade with England had been against this country ever since the war. He pursued his remarks upon the course of trade. He believed that more had been done for the commerce of the country than for all the other interests put together, and recurred to the tonnage duties, and other protecting measures, to prove it. He thought this one of the most important items in the bill, and he should consider it as lost if it was stricken out. When the hemp was out, the duck would go, and all the rest of the bill with it. He contended for such a degree of protection to the article as would encourage its domestic growth, without amounting to a prohibition of the foreign article. He referred to the price it had borne during the war, and thought it the duty of the Government to see that the nation was, in some measure, prepared for a state of war. He thought the only question in relation to this bill was, Whether we were willing to rely upon foreign nations for the necessities of life, or whether we were to produce them for ourselves. The only way to make the community prosper, he believed, was to extend a general protection to all the great branches of employment. He believed commerce was never more depressed than at present. Our cities were filled with paupers; and yet we are to go to the workshops of Europe to get the articles we want for consumption. He conceived the policy of this measure to be necessary to protect us against that of other nations. It was not a matter appertaining to one section of the country, but it was a subject of great national concern.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, explained in regard to the embarrassments of the navigating interest of the country. He read, from a letter on this subject, which he had received from an eminent merchant. He remarked further upon the balance of trade, and the difference in the value of specie in England, and in this country.

Mr. DICKERSON believed there was a majority in the Senate in favor of a reduction of the duty on hemp; as contained in the bill—but he hoped it would not be stricken out entirely. He had no doubt that it was the interest of the country to encourage the growth of this article, and every article which could be produced with ease in our own country, and by our own people, ought to be encouraged. Mr. D. believed this duty was not to favor Kentucky alone; but would operate advantageously to other parts of the country, as its growth need not be confined to Kentucky alone—other parts of the country were equally well fitted for it. There was no reason in nature, why it could not be grown and fitted for the market in this country.

Mr. D. explained, in relation to the supposed difficulties in water-rotting the hemp. He considered this as a contest between the importer, arising out of the benefit of freight, against the grower of the article in our own country. He spoke of the friendship which the gentleman from Maryland professed for domestic manufactures—and presumed that they had arrived at that point, beyond which his protection could not go. Mr. D. hoped that all those gentlemen who were willing to take an intermediate point, in regard to this duty, would vote against striking out.

Mr. SMITH answered some of the remarks of Mr. DICKERSON, which had a personal relation to himself.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, made a remark, in relation to the long petitions praying for an increase of this duty, to which the gentleman from New Jersey had alluded.

Mr. DICKERSON replied to the observations of Messrs. SMITH and TAYLOR. He said he should consider the vote to strike out this item, as destroying the bill.

Mr. KING, of New York, said that the imposition of this duty bore hard upon a particular interest of the country. If gentlemen wish to encourage the production of hemp and iron, they ought to bring in a bill to give bounties on these articles. The burden would then fall equally upon the community. There was the same Constitutional right to pass an act granting bounties on these articles, as to encourage their production in the way proposed by this bill.

The question on Mr. LLOYD's motion was then put, and carried in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

For striking out—Messrs. Barbour, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Elliott, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Mills, Parrott, Smith, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams—24.

Against striking out—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Brown, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Seymour, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, and Van Buren—23.

So the duty on hemp was stricken out by the Committee of the Whole; and the Senate adjourned.

In pursuance of notice given yesterday, Mr. EATON asked leave to introduce a bill "for the relief of John Donelson, Stephen Hurd, and others."

Mr. E. made a few remarks on the subject, and Mr. CHANDLER opposed the leave, on the ground that the bill had been rejected in the other House. To this objection, Mr. EATON replied. Leave was granted to introduce the bill. It was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the selection of certain land for the support of seminaries of learning in Missouri; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act to compensate William Cocke for certain military services rendered the United States during the late war, and for the relief of John T. Johnston;" "An act for the relief of Dean Weymouth;" "An act supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, passed the 15th of May, 1820;" "An act for the relief of Robert Blean;" "An act for the relief of Jacob Slough;" "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Fry and Spalding;" "An act for the relief of Samuel Cleveland, jr.;" "An act for the relief of John Mitchell;" "An act for the relief of Morris Goldsmith and Anthony Roderick;" "An act for the relief of John Topp;" "An act for the relief of Archibald Clark;" "An act for the relief of Benjamin King;" "An act for the relief of Maturin Guichot;" "An act for the relief of Joseph Firman, and others;" "An act for the relief of James, Jehu, and Nathaniel Brooks, and the representatives of either of them;" and "An act for the relief of John K. Carter;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. KING, of Alabama, in the Chair,) resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill from the House of Representatives, "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports."

Mr. KELLY moved to amend the bill, in the following clause: "On cotton bagging, four and a half cents per square yard, until the 30th day of June, 1825; and, afterward, a duty of five and a half cents per square yard:" by striking out from it the words, "until the 30th day of June, 1825; and, afterwards, a duty of five and a half cents per square yard."

Mr. KELLY supported his motion, at considerable length, showing the impropriety of laying such duties as to force the manufacture of this article into existence; the improbability that hemp, from which the cotton bagging is manufactured, would be soon raised in this country, in any great quantity; as its cultivation and preparation for market, was a dirty, unpleasant occupation, and uncongenial to a people possessing as many blessings, and as many more unpleasant means of employment, as are possessed by this people; that, if the people were disposed to engage in the manufacture, the duties now existing afford sufficient encouragement; and that the article ought not to receive further encouragement, at the expense of the cotton grower.

Mr. EATON replied to the arguments of Mr. KELLY, and spoke against the motion to strike out. The reporter heard his remarks but very indistinctly.

Mr. SMITH stated to the Senate the prices which cotton bagging had borne, the duties that had been imposed upon it, and the operation of the duty proposed in this bill.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, rose, and after some preliminary remarks, proceeded as follows:

I shall now, Mr. President, examine this bill, endeavor to ascertain its true character, and take a view of its probable effects. The principle contained in this bill is, that the importation of all foreign goods must be prohibited, which we are capable of making at home. This I will attempt to prove, first, from the declarations of its advocates, and next from the provisions of the bill itself. In proof of my assertion, that prohibition is the true object of this bill, I will begin, by quoting a few extracts from the published speeches of several of its most conspicuous advocates; selected from many of the same import. I will refer, in the first place, to the debate in the House of Representatives, on spirits. An honorable gentleman from New York said, "there are several items of this bill inserted with the view, certainly with the effect, of excluding the importation of the article." The same gentleman, in another place, remarks, "that he thought the principle of the bill to be a new one; he meant the principle of taxing imports, with the avowed view of protecting home industry. If the tariff was not to be a measure for revenue, but for protection, (and this, it will be recollected, was admitted on all sides,) it 'ought to go on the plan of excluding competition altogether." And, again, "he thought, in whatever part of the tariff we depart from revenue, as the object, we ought at once to go the whole length of excluding the foreign article." Another honorable gentleman from the same State, in the debate on cotton bagging, asks, "what is it we propose?" and answers the question himself, in these words, "to make this country independent of foreign manufactures." I will appeal, however, to still higher authority. The honorable Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, the official organ of that Committee, and the acknowledged leader of the party, said, "the objection to this clause (the duty 'on spirits) is, that you prevent importation—you cut off trade; well, sir! and what is the object of the whole bill, but to protect home industry, by preventing those importations which destroy it?" An honorable gentleman from Ohio, deservedly distinguished for his talents and influence, speaking in support of the wool tax, which he calls "a system of gradual prohibition," remarked "that in six years it might be total." In the course of the debate on the hemp duty, an honorable member from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) intimated a reluctance to go faster than the growth of our manufactures would warrant, and ventured to express an opinion "that the Western hemp ought to be brought into a fair competition with that of foreigners." Now, how was this idea of competition received? Why, it brought down upon his head the sharp rebuke of his friends. The honorable Speaker declared that the bill "had received an attack from a most unexpected quarter," and the Chairman of the Committee replied, "If the gentleman voted throughout on that principle, he must vote against the whole bill;" and, in illustration of his assertion, he remarks "that the duty proposed on cotton is more than one hundred and fifty per cent., and as to the duty now under consideration it amounted already to eighty or one hundred per cent." I am unwilling to fatigue the patience of the Senate by multiplying quotations, to the same effect, and will, therefore, content myself with two more. In the speech of the Chairman of the Committee, in opening the discussion of the Tariff bill, (to be found in the National Intelligencer of the 19th February,) he expressly declared, "that the duty of six cents on cotton bagging, was intended to be protective and prohibitory." And, again, speaking of what he himself calls "the prohibitory duty, imposed, in the year 1816, on cotton cloths," he says, "like the principal articles in the bill, there, the prohibitory duty was on an article, the raw material of which abounds at home." He then goes on to speak of a "similar protection of woollen manufactures, hemp, glass, and iron." Doctrines and sentiments similar to these, have, also, been disclosed, by the advocates of the tariff, in this House. My amiable and valued friend from Kentucky, (the purity of whose patriotism gives additional force to every thing he utters,) asks us, solemnly—in the name of the sacred honor and best interests of our country—whether it has not become high time to secure the home market to ourselves," and, to leave no doubt of his meaning, adds, "let us raise and confirm a system of our own, that we may "live wholly independent of foreign supply." Combining these declarations, it appears to me that the principles of the advocates of the Tariff are fairly disclosed, and the prohibitory policy "stands confessed." The course of the debate, and the reasoning resorted to by the gentlemen on this floor, lead irresistibly to the same conclusion. When, on our motion to strike out "the minimum on cottons," we insisted that the duty would amount to a total prohibition of cotton goods, to the amount of seven millions of dollars per annum; they replied, that "the importation was injurious, and ought to be prohibited, because we could make these goods at home." Nay, they have gone so far, that when we point out articles embraced in this bill, which we do not, and which it is not proposed that we should manufacture, we have been gravely told "that substitutes for them can be provided at home." Now, Mr. President, I do earnestly insist that these principles lead to nothing short of the total destruction of foreign commerce. Where is the article which may not be produced at home? or (if there be any such) for which some convenient substitute may not be provided? When, in 1816, the bill was introduced, which may be considered as the commencement of the "anti-commercial system," great alarm was excited, lest the principles now advocated, should, at some future period, be adopted in our legislation. The advocates of that bill expressly disclaimed any desire of introducing new manufactures into the country, much less of prohibiting the importation of any article from abroad. The argument then was, that in the infancy of any manufacture, it was necessary to give some assistance, to enable it to grow and acquire strength, but that such support would soon become necessary, and those establishments might then be safely left to the exertion of their own energies. The act of 1816, though now called by the gentlemen on the other side, "prohibitory," and, therefore, held up as an example, imposed duties, then deemed merely sufficient to enable existing establishments to bear up against the pressure of the times, but it was expressly provided that those duties should be subsequently diminished. Thus, on all manufactures of wool and cotton (except blankets, rugs, and stuff goods) a duty was levied of 25 per cent. until the 30th of June, 1819, and of 20 per cent. after that period.* The object was not to prohibit, but protect—to give assistance in infancy, not to support manhood—to afford succor in distress, not bounties in prosperity. Baldwin's Tariff recognised these distinctions, and expressly provided for the diminution of the duties after three years. But the mask has now been thrown off. The new principle of progressive duties has been introduced into this bill, and this amounts to a distinct acknowledgment that the object now is, not competition, but prohibition. I wish to call the serious attention of the Senate to this feature of the bill—now introduced into our laws for the first time. Compare for a moment, a few of the proposed duties, with those imposed by the act of 1816.

Proposed rate of Duties.		Duties by act of 1816.
Manufactures of wool :
30 pr. ct. to 30 June, 1825		25 pr. ct. to 30 June, 1819

37½ do. after that time
Manufactures of cotton :
25 pr. ct. with a minimum of twenty-five cents per square yard		25 pr. ct. to June 30, 1819
		20 do. after that time with a min. of 25 cents
Wool unmanufactured :
20 pr. ct. to 1st June, 1825		15 per cent.
25 do. do. 1826
30 do. do. 1827

The first duty proposed, of 20 per cent. on wool, and 30 per cent. on woollen cloths, if admitted to be sufficient to bring the domestic article into a fair competition with the foreign; otherwise, it would be sufficient to save our sinking establishments from "overwhelming influence of foreign competition," what is the object of the progressive increase of the duties, year after year, from 20 to 50 per cent.? The answer is plain, eventually to prohibit the foreign supply: and the only reason why this is not done at once is, that the friends of the policy are solicitous that it should not operate so oppressively on the people, as to influence public opinion and produce a reaction fatal to their hopes. It is impossible, sir, by any evasion or subtlety, to disguise the truth; gentlemen must, in candor, acknowledge the obvious fact, that this progressive duty looks to prohibition, and is intended totally to prohibit the importation of the particular goods to which they relate. And the same principle which would justify prohibitory duties, in relation to wool, woollen and cotton goods, and cotton bagging, must lead to the prohibition of iron, hemp, flax, lead, and, in short, of every article which we are capable of making at home. Thus it is proposed to prohibit foreign distilled spirit, and wines will soon share the same fate, to encourage the manufacture and consumption of whiskey—cotton goods are to be substituted for silk—and oil is to supply the place of tallow. You may modify this bill, Mr. President, as you please,* so long as the progressive duties are retained in it, the principle of prohibition, immediate or eventual, is recognised. Can any friend to commerce, any advocate of the Navy, any one anxious for the honor and welfare of his country, give his support to a bill which is to introduce a new principle into our legislation; a principle which it has been shown leads directly and inevitably to the prohibition of foreign trade? Let the system flourish; let gentlemen proceed "in the full tide of experiment," and, my life upon it, they will soon attain that enviable state "when the nation will command its own consumption, and importation and imposts will cease." This is "the consummation" of "the American policy of encouraging home industry;" a policy foreign in all its features, confessedly borrowed from Great Britain—Chinese in its character, (for it deprives our citizens of the free use of the ocean which rolls at their feet,) the policy of kings and of tyrants, of restriction and monopoly, at variance with all our institutions, and involving the loss of our ships, our seamen, and our Navy.

If I have succeeded in any degree in proving the position I have taken, I should hope that this bill would lose the support of some gentlemen, who have advocated it as a measure of protection, intended merely to produce a "fair competition," but who would give no countenance to the "prohibitory policy." But, if I have wholly failed; if this bill does not look to prohibition; if its true object be to draw labor and capital from certain pursuits, supposed to be unprofitable, into others, which, it is asserted, will be more advantageous, both to individuals and the State, I should still strongly object to the measure, as resting on visionary theories and false doctrines; as being necessarily unjust and unequal in its operation, and calculated to aggravate the very evils it is intended to remedy.

The first objection which I shall urge against this policy, is, that it assumes, that Government is capable of regulating industry, better than individuals—a position which is wholly untenable. From the nature of things, labor and capital should be permitted to seek their own employment, under the guidance, entirely, of individual prudence and sagacity. Government, from the very elevation of its position, is necessarily incapable of taking that close view of the subject, and obtaining that accurate knowledge of details, indispensable to a judicious determination of the relative advantages of different pursuits, in any community. This depends so much on local circumstances, that personal observation and individual exertions are alone competent to the task. In the domestic concerns of nations, as of individuals, it is sufficient that men are prevented from trespassing on the property, or invading the rights of their neighbors. In all other respects they should be left entirely free. If any doubts existed on this point, I should have supposed that the most superficial observer would have discovered, in the progress of this bill, conclusive evidence of our utter incapacity to accomplish the task we have assumed. Though surrounded by manufacturers generously willing out of their abundant stores of knowledge and experience to supply all our deficiencies, have we not found it impossible to penetrate the veil thrown around the pursuits in which they are engaged? I will appeal with confidence to the Senate, and ask, whether the most notorious facts have not been denied or perverted, and the most contradictory statements submitted, and whether we are not at this moment left in profound ignorance, not only of the actual rate of profits, but of the true condition of every branch of manufacturing industry? We cannot know, therefore, either the degree of protection wanted, or the best means of extending it. Are not the provisions of the bill exactly conformable to this state of our information. I will venture to assert that no bill was ever introduced into any legislative body in this, or any other country, composed of such heterogeneous provisions, and contradictory principles. Here is said to be a "flourishing manufacture," and, therefore, it is to be encouraged; here is "a languishing establishment," and it must be sustained; while such as have no existence, are to be created; some, because they require much skill and large capitals, and others, because they require neither skill nor capital. Some branches of industry are to be encouraged because others are "overdone," but these must also be protected "against foreign competition threatening to destroy them." There are duties on the manufactured articles, and duties on the raw material; and, in short, the whole bill is a tissue of inconsistencies. In attempting to gratify the wishes of interested individuals, we are legislating in the dark, distributing the national funds by a species of State lottery—scattering abroad bounties and premiums of unknown amount; and all this, without the rational prospect of producing any effect, except that of sowing the seeds of dissension among the people, and thereby introducing mischiefs which may last to the remotest generations. We are opening a Pandora's box of political evils, which, when they have gone abroad, will not even leave hope at the bottom.

* The bill received no less than thirty-seven amendments in the Senate, nearly all of which tended to render its operation less oppressive, and to deprive it of its prohibitory character. The foregoing remarks, therefore, are chiefly applicable to the bill, in the shape in which it came from the House of Representatives. It is to be observed, however, that the progressive duties have been retained.

This system of regulating, by law, the private pursuits of men, or, what amounts to the same thing, passing laws for increasing the profits of certain employments, and lessening the profits of others, thereby driving men from the pursuits of their choice, to those which the Government is pleased to favor, has, it is true, been sanctioned by the practice of other nations, and comes down to us from the remotest ages. But I consider it, sir, only as a part of that system of tyranny and arbitrary rule, to which men have been subjected in every age. If it has become venerable, it is only from time, and, like monarchy, has no claims to our respect but its antiquity. I admit, that, in England, the industry of individuals has always been thus regulated. We know, that in that country emigration is, in many cases, prohibited; that the wages of labor, and employment of capital, and even the price of commodities, are, in various ways, directed and controlled. In other parts of Europe, the doctrine of regulation is carried still further, and a man's religious and political opinions, as well as his pursuits, are taken "in the holy keeping" of those whose only qualification for the task consists in their anxious desire to keep down the aspirations of the immortal mind.

Sir, it would afford matter for curious speculation, if the various regulations by which men have been controlled in their pursuits, could be presented in one view to our consideration. In England, we find that, in the reign of Henry IV., the Crown was authorized, by an act of Parliament, to order "one rood of flax or hemp to be planted for every sixty acres cultivated in other grains," and this was done for the purpose, as it is quaintly expressed, "of making of nets and eschewing of idleness." But, it is in the East that we find the system, advocated by the gentlemen on the other side, carried to the greatest perfection. Without dwelling, however, on this topic, I will concede all the gentlemen can ask; I will admit, that Governments have every where, and in every age, presumed to regulate man in all his pursuits. Every thing connected with his existence, from the cradle to the grave, nay, beyond the grave; the language he shall speak; the food he shall eat; the trade he shall follow; the place in which he shall dwell; the opinions he shall cherish; the books he shall read, and the God he shall worship; every thing, in short, which belongs to him as a created being, is the subject of arbitrary regulation, and man is made a creature without heart, or soul, or mind—a mere machine, obedient to the will of the human artist who puts it into operation. But, sir, we were taught to believe, that the establishment of our Government formed a new era in the history of the world, and that the practical operation of our Constitution was destined to exhibit a splendid example of the perfection to which man would attain, when freed from the shackles which had been imposed on him in other countries. We were taught to expect that a Government, instituted by a people, and administered for their benefit alone, where the human mind would be left without restraint to pursue its own happiness in its own way, must, by its good fruits, recommend a free system to all nations. I can well recollect, sir, that, among the first lessons instilled into my mind, that which made the deepest and most lasting impression, was to consider the Republican Institutions of my country, like the air we breathe, as bestowing life, and health, and happiness, without our being conscious of the means by which these inestimable gifts are conferred; like the providence of God, unfelt and unseen, yet dispensing the richest blessings to all the children of men. But these, we are told, are the illusions of the imagination. Man cannot be safely left to mark out his own course to happiness; but here, as elsewhere, the various employments of industry and capital must be so artificially arranged and balanced, as to produce results to be prescribed by law.

To understand the true remedy for existing evils, we must ascertain their nature and extent, and know the causes which produced them. I beg the indulgence of the Senate whilst I prosecute these inquiries. And here, I insist, that the pictures of the great distress and acute suffering of the people are exaggerated. All classes of our people are supplied with food—not, as in many parts of Europe, of a single kind, and of insufficient quantity, but in great variety, and in vast abundance; they have convenient dwellings, sufficient fuel, and warm and comfortable clothing, and these blessings are possessed to an extent which leaves no room for complaint in any part of the country. We possess, too, the means of educating our children; colleges have advanced with a rapidity heretofore unexampled, and common schools are daily springing up even in the wilderness, a religion, pure and undefiled, sheds its blessings on our heads, and, to crown the whole, the spirit of liberty walks abroad in our land, crushing the oppressor, inculcating the lessons of wisdom and of virtue, giving protection to the weak, and security to all. Now, if any monarch in Europe could, by pursuing a wise and liberal policy, bring the mass of his subjects into this condition, he would be followed by the blessings of his people, and would command the admiration of the world.

When I admit, therefore, that the country is in a state of depression, I must not be understood as conceding that there is any want of the necessities or conveniences of life. No, sir, that depression consists entirely in diminished prices for the produce of our labor, and is not confined, as gentlemen have supposed, to certain places, or to particular employments, but embraces the whole country, and is almost equally felt by all classes in society. It is also lamentably true, that men in the middle and higher ranks of life, are considerably involved in debt, and I will certainly not attempt to deny that these are evils of great magnitude, or that they have produced, and must continue to produce, serious embarrassments. Now, in searching for the causes of this state of things, it is not a little astonishing that gentlemen should pass over the great political events which have obviously placed the United States in a new position in relation to the rest of the world, and should look entirely to temporary circumstances and transient causes; such, for instance, as the "balance of trade," and the "drain of specie."

The fact, that, from the commencement of the French revolution to the fall of Napoleon, the United States occupied a neutral position, and enjoyed the privilege of monopolizing the carrying trade, and commanding for her breadstuffs the markets of the world, would sufficiently account, not only for the rapid growth and extraordinary prosperity of our country, but also for the temporary depression which must result from the loss of these advantages. Our fields have almost literally been fertilized by the blood of Europe; we have fattened on the crimes of her tyrants, and the sufferings of her people. This has resulted entirely from our peculiar and felicitous situation; a nation at peace, with a salubrious climate, a rich and varied soil, and a rapidly increasing population, protected and fostered by a free Government, and liberal institutions; whilst all the rest of the world was involved in the horrors of war. That an increase in wealth beyond all former example, and in general prosperity without a parallel, should have sprung out of such a state of things, was natural, and, indeed, inevitable. The consequence, however, of this forced prosperity was, that the wages of labor and the interest of money became extravagantly high, foreign capital and skill were attracted to our shores, and a premature impulse being given to industry, results were produced so surprising, as to border upon fable. American enterprise, like the lamp of the magician, converted every thing it touched into gold; the growth of centuries was attained in a few years, and from youth, the nation sprang up at once, and attained not only the vigor and strength of manhood, but a giant's stature. It was the necessary consequence of the state of prosperity, which I have described, that habits of expense should be formed, which nothing but extraordinary profits could support. Every thing was conducted on a liberal scale, and the original curse, "that man should eat his bread by the sweat of his brow," was unfelt and forgotten. At the very moment that we were indulging in golden dreams of endless prosperity—the restoration of tranquillity to Europe, and the return of all nations to the arts of peace, brought her subjects at once into competition with our merchants and farmers, in all those pursuits, from which they had reaped such rich rewards. The loss, in a great degree, of the foreign market for our grain, and of the carrying trade; the loss, in one word, of our neutral position, produced a change in the condition of the people, which could not fail to be severely felt. This change, which would, under any circumstances, have been painful, has unfortunately been rendered peculiarly oppressive in some parts of the country, by the unsettled state of the currency—the multiplication of banks—the extensive issue of the paper money, and the unjust interference of the Legislatures of some of the States, to prevent the enforcement of debts. In some of the Western States, for example, paper banks were established, and money issued to an extent almost incredible. In one of those States, forty banks were incorporated by a single act of the Legislature; they were located in different parts of the country—an immense amount of paper was issued and circulated—the farmers were tempted to borrow and indulge themselves in the most extravagant expenditures, and when this evil had reached its height—their local banks (having, by their worthless paper, driven all the specie out of the country) stopped business, and left the people to pay their debts how they could.

The whole of our calamities, Mr. President, may be summed up in a few words—debts, and want of money. Now, debts cannot be paid without money, and as we have no mines, and cannot manufacture silver and gold, I am at a loss to conceive how we are to obtain money, or discharge our debts, by cutting off foreign trade. Having thus pointed out, what I suppose to be the nature, extent, and true source, of all our difficulties, I will proceed to consider the causes assigned by gentlemen on the other side. These are—

1. The balance of trade and drain of specie.

2. The loss of our exports; and
3. That commerce and agriculture are overdone.

On each of these, I must make a few remarks. In relation to the balance of trade, the gentlemen turn to our public documents, and showing from these that we import more than we export, at once conclude that the balance is against us. During the last year, say they, we actually imported goods to the amount of $77,579,267, while we exported only $74,699,030, from which they infer that the nation fell in debt nearly three millions of dollars. But will gentlemen call to mind that we employed, in the importation and exportation of the goods, 800,000 tons of shipping; and as the capital invested in those ships, must, of course, have yielded some profit, it was necessary that we should import, not only the value of the merchandise exported, but the amount of the freight. The imports of every country must, therefore, exceed the exports in value, by an amount at least equal to the profits.

Though gentlemen have argued this point with great earnestness, I really cannot persuade myself that it is necessary to say much in reply; I will merely advert, therefore, to one or two facts in support of my views. It has been stated in a recent publication, of unquestionable authority, that thirty-nine vessels sailed from Portsmouth, N. H., in one year, in ballast; that these vessels were employed in the carrying trade in Europe, and realized a clear profit of $150,000, with which they returned to the United States. Now, according to the custom-house books, it appears that in this case, we imported $150,000 more than we exported, and this sum is actually included in the balance which the gentlemen set down against us. Can it escape the notice of the gentlemen that, according to their mode of calculation, a cargo lost in the ocean, or sold in Europe for half its value, creates a balance in our favor, while one doubled in value, swells the balance against us? The plain truth is, that no higher evidence can possibly be furnished of the prosperous state of our commerce than that our imports uniformly exceed our exports, and this excess has always been greatest when our trade has been most prosperous. It is so well understood and acknowledged in Europe, that a prosperous trade cannot exist without importing more than you export, that when the statements of the custom-houses in England have exhibited a different result, the circumstance has been accounted for by showing that it has arisen entirely from the difference between the official valuation and the actual value of goods.

Both the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TALLNOT,) and the Chairman of the Committee, have treated this subject, as if all importation ran the country in debt. Now, I would seriously ask those gentlemen, whether they believe that, when we export our produce, we make a free gift of it to a foreign nation? or, can they imagine that, in sending us their goods, they are bestowing a gratuity? If not, it follows that each party must receive some equivalent, and this is found in the exchange of commodities, on terms mutually advantageous. Nor does the intervention of specie make the least difference in the case; for, though silver is used as a standard of value, yet it is only a commodity, which, like all others, is obtained in exchange for produce. There can be no drain of specie, therefore, while trade is free, and we have any thing to exchange for it. And what possible difference can it make whether we pay for an article in produce, or in the gold and silver, which we buy with that produce? But, here my friend from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) asks, "whether we mean to contend that there is no such thing as a balance of trade?" In answer, I will state, that a nation may import from a particular place, or in a particular year, more than a fair return for the articles exported, and in either case a debt may certainly be created. But from the very nature of trade, this can only exist for a short period, the over importation from one place, or in one year, being necessarily balanced by under importations from other places, or in other years; and thus, in a series of years, the whole amount of imports and exports must balance each other. Sharp-sighted and experienced importing merchants, are not at all like "spendthrift heirs." They do not go on increasing their imports beyond the means of the country to pay for them; nor does the foreign merchant continue to send on his goods, after he finds that his customers cease to make remittances. The accounts are balanced at stated periods, and the debt is paid, in the only way by which such a debt ever could be paid—by the produce of the country. I conclude, therefore, that if a nation exports, it must import, and so, vice versa. As a general rule, all parties concerned in trade derive a profit. It is the increased value given to commodities by labor or art, or by the mere act of transportation, which is the foundation of commerce. In this way the world is perpetually progressing in wealth and refinement; and every advance that is made in science or in art—every new impulse given to industry—adds to the comfort and happiness of mankind. I repeat, therefore, that so far from mourning over the immense amount of our imports, we may resort to them, as affording, not only conclusive evidence that we are going on prosperously, but as furnishing almost the standard by which that prosperity can be measured. Away, then, Mr. President, with this argument of "the balance of trade."

But the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ELTON) insists, that there is one fact which demonstrates that the balance of trade must be against us—that fact is, the rate of exchange, which he states is now no less than eight per cent. in favor of Great Britain. The chairman of the committee, as well as the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. D'WOLF,) have also strongly relied on this circumstance. Now, are these gentlemen not aware, that eight per cent. premium on bills of exchange on England, is at this time actually below par? It is manifest that the nominal rate of exchange can furnish no evidence of the actual difference, except where the standard of value is the same. If the currency of one country should be coin, and of another depreciated paper—if gold be the standard in one place, and silver in another, or if the coins be of different value, the rate of exchange must be influenced by all of these circumstances, and could furnish not the slightest evidence of the true balance of trade. Is it not obvious, that, under ordinary circumstances, the difference of exchange between countries, whose currency is the same, would be merely the expense of transporting specie? Why should an American merchant pay a debt in England by a bill of exchange, at eight or ten per cent. premium, when the expense of sending the specie to England would not exceed two per cent. Gentlemen will see at once, therefore, that there must be a fallacy in their argument; for if the premium of eight per cent. on bills, was the measure of the real difference of exchange, no bills would be purchased, but specie would be shipped. The truth is, the currency of the two countries is different. In considering the rate of exchange, between the United States and England, it must always be recollected that, practically, silver is the standard of the United States, because in silver only all payments are made, while gold is the standard in England, because in gold alone all payments are made—silver not being even a legal tender for sums above two pounds; they are then not susceptible of direct comparison, being things entirely dissimilar, and must be compared by some indirect mean. This mean is familiarly known in practice, and is obvious in principle. It is as follows: Compare the standard value of a given quantity (an ounce for instance) of the pure contents of our silver coin, with the market value, in England, of the same quantity of pure silver. I hold in my hand two statements, obtained from gentlemen perfectly conversant with the subject. The first exhibits this comparison, in a case when the market value in England, is supposed to be 4s. 9½d. per ounce of Spanish dollars. There is a difference between Spanish and American dollars, which this paper also explains. The second, is an extension of the principle of the first, and shows the apparent loss, but in truth, the real par of exchange, in the several instances, which it enumerates. From these statements, it appears that exchange on England being at fifteen per cent. premium, and Spanish dollars in the English market at 4s. 6d. per ounce, is really at par, because the bill of exchange of $100, which is purchased at $115, will procure in the English market $115 Spanish dollars—and when dollars are at 4s. 9½d. in the English market, (which is about the present price,) if exchange on England be below eight per cent., it is below par, and in favor of the United States. I have this day received a letter from a highly respectable gentleman in Philadelphia, who assures me, that a merchant may now purchase a bill of exchange on London with silver, (or notes, for which silver can be obtained,) at the rate of nine per cent. premium, and that when he takes it to England, he will receive for it gold at par, with which he will be able to purchase 109 silver dollars—should the price of silver, continue in England, the same as at the last accounts—thus making the purchase of a bill at nine per cent. premium, actually a purchase at par. The gentleman from Tennessee, therefore, will perceive, that his "eight per cent. premium" on bills, is below par; that he could obtain in England for such a bill, more than he would give for it here, and therefore, according to his views of the subject, the balance of trade must be in favor of the United States.

With respect to the loss of our exports, I think gentlemen are equally mistaken. It was to have been expected, that the causes to which I have adverted, if they did not greatly lessen the amount, would change the character of our exports, and it does not appear to me, that the result has been as fortunate as could have been reasonably expected.

In 1823, the amount of our domestic exports was	-	-	-	$47,155,408
Same year, the amount of our foreign exports was	-	-	-	27,543,622
Making in all	-	-	-	$74,699,030
In 1822, domestic exports	$49,874,079
" foreign do.	22,286,202
				72,160,281
Increase	-	-	-	$2,538,749

Now, from 1790 to 1816, a period of twenty-six years, it appears (from Seybert, p. 93) that there was but one year when our domestic exports exceeded forty-seven millions; and while our exports of foreign articles has been reduced more than one-half, our domestic exports have remained nearly the same in amount. It is our commerce then that has chiefly suffered.

If it be said, that particular States have lost a market for their grain, and that our exports are principally of cotton, rice, and tobacco, I will ask, if gentlemen propose to remedy that inconvenience by equalizing the relative advantages of different portions of the Union? Must the cotton planter pay to the grower of wheat a portion of his profits to equalize their incomes? If so, some portion of the immense sums received by the latter for their grain during the war, must be brought into the account; for gentlemen will recollect, that when our cotton was lying in our barns for years together, the people of the West were receiving for their flour sometimes as much as thirty or forty dollars a barrel, and that the manufacturers then possessed a complete monopoly of the home market?

It is true, Mr. President, that our march to greatness has been interrupted by impediments, which have arrested our rapid progress. But these are happily not insurmountable, though they can only be overcome by patience, fortitude, and perseverance. We must be wanting to ourselves, however, if this nation does not yet fulfil its high destinies.

But, we are told, in the last place, that "commerce and agriculture have been overdone," and it has become necessary to divert a portion of our surplus capital and labor to other pursuits. When we call for the proof of this assertion, gentlemen point to the surplus produce of the country, which they tell us, is "rotting in our barns." But if the flour remaining on the hands of the farmer, proves that "agriculture is overdone," then manufactures must also be overdone, for gentlemen tell us "of large quantities of goods, which are remaining unsold in the hands of the manufacturer," and by the same rule all the pursuits in life, even the learned professions, and the mechanic arts, must be greatly overdone. As to the diminution of exports, so far as this exists, it would just as much prove that manufactures, as that agriculture, or commerce, are overdone; for precisely to the extent to which you supply your wants at home, will be the diminution of the quantity of goods imported, and consequently of the articles sent abroad to pay for them; and this evil must be increased, and not diminished, by the extension of manufactures. The truth is, that we are suffering from general causes, which affect, nearly equally, every department of life, and it is not true, that any branch of industry is peculiarly overdone. From the chaos into which the world has been thrown by the astonishing events of modern times, the political elements have not yet had time to settle down into their appropriate stations. Society only wants time to adjust itself to a new order of affairs. The citizens of the United States have been basking in the sunshine of prosperity—they have revelled so long in the luxuries of wealth and refinement—that they cannot at once become reconciled to a life of patient labor and persevering industry. An honorable gentleman, from the West actually attributes the failure of our manufactures, in a great measure, "to the impatience of the American character," and tells us "that the people are soon disgusted and discouraged." And shall we, sir, adapt our legislation to such a character; or shall we not rather cultivate a national character, which shall be distinguished for patient industry and unshaken perseverance? I would cherish, sir, in the American people,

A towering, and deep rooted strength of soul,
Which, like the oak, might shake in Summer winds,
But stript by Winter, stands immoveable.

Having thus traced to their source the causes of the evils under which the nation suffers, I will proceed to examine the remedy proposed. This consists in the creation by law of great manufacturing establishments. The gentlemen insist, that this employment of labor and capital, is, in the abstract, most profitable, and they consider the value added to the raw material as the exact measure of that profit. I must, at the very threshold of this inquiry, express my astonishment—that gentlemen should overlook the obvious truth, that, if the use of labor-saving machinery rendered manufactures more profitable than other pursuits, labor and capital would, according to an unerring law of our nature, immediately flow into that channel, until the profits should be brought down to the common level. If it were true that labor in manufactures, would produce "ten times as much labor in agriculture or commerce," it would only follow, that the manufactured articles would be reduced to one-tenth of the former prices; and the profits of all pursuits would soon be equalized. This is a conclusive answer to the whole argument in favor of machine labor. But, if the value added to the raw material, (without any consideration of the capital invested,) be the test of the profits of different pursuits, I am inclined to think that agriculture would be found to have an advantage over manufactures. The latter, we are told, adds ten fold to the raw material—the former adds, perhaps, a hundred. The manufacturer, aided by his machinery, converts, by his labor, a pound of cotton, which cost twenty cents, into two yards of cloth, worth two dollars—while the farmer puts a few grains into the earth, which cost him almost nothing, and by the help of his horse and his plough, with the assistance of the elements, (all of which constitute his labor-saving machinery,) produces a hundred, and in some cases a thousand fold. Is his pursuit, therefore, the most profitable? No—the profits will be equalized by the prices—and these will be regulated by an unerring standard, common to all pursuits, viz: the interest on the capital, and wages of labor.

But it has been most earnestly insisted, that we must pass this bill, to encourage home industry, and that manufacturing establishments must be promoted, because the goods which they will furnish, will be the produce of American capital and labor. Gentlemen appear seriously to believe, that nothing is the result of American industry, which is not made at home. Now, sir, I insist, that home industry is as much exerted, and American labor and capital in all respects as much employed in obtaining an article from abroad, as in making it at home. When Great Britain sends to this country her manufactured goods, how do we pay for them? Surely with the produce of our labor. It is true, we may give ten pounds of cotton for one pound of cloth, but then, it costs us no more capital or labor to produce the ten pounds of cotton, than it does the British manufacturer to work up the pound of cotton into cloth. The wages of labor, and the interest on the capital, is the standard of value in both cases; and, as the English laborer works harder and fares worse than the American, we probably get the advantage in the exchange. It will not be denied, that the labor employed in producing the articles which we export, is home industry—neither will it be questioned, that the labor employed in building, equipping, and navigating the ships which carry them to market, is home industry; then, it surely follows, that the goods obtained in exchange for this produce, is the result of home industry, and may most truly be said to be produced by that industry. It can make no difference whatever, whether such articles be made at home or abroad—it will be our interest to obtain them, where they can be procured cheapest. I will illustrate my positions, by stating a case. Suppose a thousand families to be exclusively employed in what the gentlemen on the other side call "home industry," that is to say, some of them are employed in cultivating grain, some in raising sheep, and others in manufacturing cloth. At the end of the year it is found, that, over and above maintaining themselves in comfort, they have accumulated a surplus of ten thousand yards of broad-cloth, worth in the market forty thousand dollars. This will be admitted to be "American labor" and "home industry." Now, suppose the same persons to be distributed differently—a part of them are employed in raising articles for food, a part for exportation, and the remainder (as merchants, seamen, &c.,) in transporting the surplus produce to a foreign market, and exchanging it for cloth. At the end of the year, their gains are also summed up, and it is found that, besides maintaining themselves, they have with their surplus produce imported cloth to the value of $40,000. I will ask whether the article thus imported, is not as much the product of home industry as if it had been manufactured in the country? Neither the country nor the individuals would be richer or poorer, whether the cloth was made at home or brought from abroad; while the pursuits in the latter case, being more liberal and diversified, would be calculated to produce a beneficial influence on the national character. But, if the whole labor and capital of the one hundred persons, above mentioned, could, when employed in agriculture and commerce, produce ten thousand yards of cloth, but when employed in the manufacture of the article, could (from the want of skill, and capital, or other causes) produce only five thousand yards, it is manifest that a great loss must be sustained—a loss of no less than one-half of the whole capital and labor employed. Now, if, in such a case, the Government should step in, and in order to make the pursuit profitable, impose such a duty on foreign cloth as would enable the manufacturers to sell the five thousand yards at double price, (viz: for $40,000,) then it is clear that an unprofitable pursuit would be made profitable by a bounty taken out of the pockets of the consumers; and if you extend the system on a large scale, to various branches of manufactures, it is obvious that individuals would not only be taxed, to a great amount, but the nation would be impoverished, by diverting the labor and capital of its citizens, from a more, to a less profitable pursuit.

If it be manifest from this case, (and a hundred others could be put, equally strong) that the question, whether manufacturing at home be preferable to importing, depends altogether on the fact, which yields the most profit, it seems to follow, that it is the interest of the nation, as it is of individuals, to buy where they can buy cheapest, and this requires no legislation. If we can make cloth cheaper at home than we can buy it abroad, we will make it at home; if not, it is our interest to import it. In the case (supposed by the gentlemen on the other side,) of a farmer who had nothing to give for his cloth but grain, which the foreign merchant would not take, I admit that it might be necessary for him to make the exchange where he could effect it, without regard to the price. No such case, however, can exist, for as long as wheat can be exchanged for any thing, it will command money, and if it cannot be so exchanged, its cultivation must be abandoned. Gentlemen deceive themselves greatly, if they suppose that the American manufacturer will take their surplus wheat in payment for his cloth. Manufacturing establishments depend much more on capital than on labor, and though the spinners and weavers may consume flour, machinery and capital certainly will not. The quantity of grain consumed in the country will not be increased by manufactures; nor do I believe that the quantity produced will be materially diminished. The fact is, if there be a surplus of grain, or of any other article, the quantity produced must be lessened. There are a thousand agricultural products of which our soil is capable, to which our attention has not even been turned. A very short time will serve to develop the resources of the country, and open abundant sources of profitable and useful employment, and our citizens will emerge from their present difficulties "like gold purified in the furnace."

I admit, Mr. President, that there are exceptions to the rules I have laid down. I admit, that the munitions of war, and the articles necessary to national defence should be provided at home, no matter at what expense, on the ground that we should not expose ourselves even to the risk of being left, in the event of war, without the means of self-protection. Beyond this, all duties should be imposed merely for the purposes of revenue. It will not, it cannot be denied, that a duty imposed on foreign articles, for the express purpose of protecting the domestic manufacture, is a tax on the consumer.

But, we are told, that, though in the first instance the effect of the system may be to impose a tax on consumers, yet that they will be compensated in the end, by a diminution in the prices; by furnishing a home market for the raw material; and, finally, by extensive exportation of the manufactured article; and here gentlemen confidently appeal to the experience of the country, under the tariff of 1816. It has been repeatedly asserted, in both Houses, that the wisdom of the prohibitory policy has been established by the fruits of that bill; that all the predictions of the Southern gentlemen have been falsified and that it has been demonstrated that, as soon as a manufacture is brought into existence, by the protecting system, the price of the article is diminished, and exportation begins. Sir, I am persuaded that gentlemen have greatly deceived themselves, and the country, on this subject. I apprehend that prices have not materially fallen, and I feel myself well warranted in asserting, that there exists no fact or circumstance which authorizes the statement that cotton goods have been exported to South America to any considerable extent. It is said that the extensive failure of our manufactures after the war, arose from the want of adequate protection. Now, sir, it is not true that this calamity arose from want of protection. If the act of 1816 had saved the cotton factories, and the want of protection had destroyed the woollen, then the failures would have taken place exclusively among the latter. But what was the fact? Why, four-fifths of all the manufactories which failed in New England, were of coarse cotton goods; and in relation to these, the gentlemen admit they enjoyed the benefit of a "prohibitory duty." This fact I assert on unquestionable authority, and it certainly proves that the failures were not the consequence of want of protection. Nor is it true that, in consequence of the act of 1816, prices have fallen so low as to afford compensation for the bounties we have been compelled to pay to the manufacturers. There has been a considerable diminution in the quantity of money; a sound currency has been in a great measure restored, money has therefore increased in value, and property has consequently fallen. The average diminution in the value of land, we are informed, is nearly fifty per cent. and a similar fall has taken place in almost every species of property. Cotton cloths have not, therefore, fallen in price, unless they can now be procured for one-half of what they cost in 1816, and this is certainly not the case. I will put it to the candor of gentlemen, whether coarse cottons can now be purchased as low here as in England. And if not, where is our gain from the fall of prices? Look, Mr. President, at the experience of the country, in relation to the manufacture of two articles; I mean shoes and hats. Has the almost total prohibition of the foreign article, and the monopoly of the home market, lessened the prices? No, sir, we pay more for our hats and shoes than any people on earth, and when almost every article imported from abroad has fallen twenty or thirty per cent., these maintain their prices, immoveable. With respect to the home market for our raw material, I deny that the cotton-growers have yet derived any material advantage from that source; and I am wholly at a loss to conceive how the home market ever can supply the place of the foreign market, in this respect. The quantity of cotton annually produced in the United States is 600,000 bales; of this, the amount worked up in our manufacturing establishments, is about 80,000 bales. Now, if the cotton-growers have found a home market for this quantity, I wish to know if they do not receive goods in payment? and whether they are not, thereby, prevented from importing the same amount of goods from abroad, for which they would have paid by exporting these very 80,000 bales of cotton? If the prices of the goods, therefore, were exactly the same, it is obvious that the cotton-growers would be neither gainers nor losers by the change which has been effected in the course of this trade; but, if they have thereby been compelled to pay a higher price for their goods, then it is clear that they have actually been losers, to the whole amount of the difference. But how, I would seriously ask, is it possible for the home market to supply the place of the foreign market, for our cotton? We supply Great Britain with the raw material, out of which she furnishes the continent of Europe, nay, the whole world, with cotton goods. We sent to England, last year, 448,000 bales of cotton, of which she returned us not more than 50,000 bales, in cotton goods. Now, suppose our manufacturing establishments could make every yard of cloth which we consume, that would furnish a home market for no more than 50,000 out of the 450,000 bales of cotton, now shipped to Great Britain; leaving on our hands 400,000 bales, equal to two-thirds of our whole produce. If our manufactures could supplant the English in the markets of Europe, it might be otherwise. But this idea is certainly too extravagant to be seriously entertained. And are we prepared to cut off the foreign market for two-thirds of our cotton, equal in value to more than thirteen millions of dollars per annum, on the desperate experiment of supplying Europe with cotton goods?

The amount of the bounty paid to the cotton and woollen manufactures, by virtue of the act of 1816, may be estimated by the following striking facts, to which we would call the serious attention of the Senate. The Committee of Ways and Means, in their report of the 30th of April, 1822, noticing "the rapid increase of the manufactures of the country, an increase, which the most sanguine had not anticipated," take a view of the effect on the revenue, and remark, that—
 "In the year 1818, the imports of cottons and woollens amounted to - - - $20,804,188
 "But, in 1820, only to - - - 8,980,074

Making a difference, in two years, of 15,824,113
 "A loss to an extent no human being could have foreseen."

In 1819 the imports of woollen and cotton amounted to - - - -	$24,804,188
1819 - - - -	16,555,399
1820 - - - -	8,988,074

Thus it appears that, under the operation of this "wonder-working system," we lost in one year upwards of eight millions of our imports, and the next year sixteen millions, making, in two years, twenty-four millions of dollars, with a loss in revenue equal to six millions of dollars. But it has been most earnestly insisted that we have derived ample compensation for these losses by the exportation of our cotton goods to South America. Now I call for a statement of the nature and amount of such exports. In the absence of all proof, I would rely with great confidence on circumstances to show that the gentlemen have mistaken their sanguine hopes for undoubted facts—the first is, that it is, from the very nature of things, highly improbable that we should successfully compete with Great Britain, in foreign markets, in respect to these manufactures, which can only be sustained at home, by protective duties of from twenty-five to one hundred per cent. Is it not absurd to talk of entering into competition with the English abroad, if we cannot do it at home? Indeed, what are our advantages over the English? Their machinery is carried to the greatest possible perfection—their skill has been matured by knowledge and extensive experience—prodigious capitals have been accumulated by the successful trade of centuries—and the wages of labor are so low, as barely to sustain the artist; surely, with these advantages, it is idle to suppose that we will be able to drive the English out of any foreign market. At home it may be different, and, in respect to these articles, which are chiefly produced by labor-saving machinery, and for which we possess the raw material in abundance, the protection necessarily afforded by our revenue system, and our distance from Europe will, I doubt not, enable us to enter into successful competition with foreigners. As to our exports to South America, it may be true, that a few cargoes of cotton goods have found their way to this country and to Mexico. But this has probably arisen from the unsettled state of those countries; or we may have sent those goods merely as the means of paying (at a price, perhaps, below their cost) for articles imported from thence, and expected to be sold here at extravagant profits. I have carefully examined the official documents, for the purpose of ascertaining the kind and quantity of cotton cloths exported to South America. I find, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the quantity is not sufficiently great to be classed under a separate head. But the whole amount of exports of American manufactured articles, of every description, to South America and Mexico, is as follows, viz :

Spanish South America and Mexico	-	$227,520
Honduras, Campeachy, and Musquito	-
Shore	-	6,595
Brazil and Portuguese colonies	-	38,281

Making	-	-	-	-	-	272,396
--------	---	---	---	---	---	---------

While our exports of foreign goods to those places amounted to four millions.

What portion of this $272,000 consisted of cotton goods we are not informed. I should suppose it could not exceed one-third; taking it, however, to be one-half, it would only amount to $130,000, in round numbers; and this is the immense exportation of cotton goods to South America, about which so much noise has been made. Why, sir, we imported last year nearly as much cotton from South America, and a cargo of wheat was brought from Europe to New York. But does this prove that South America can supplant our cotton in the home market, or that Europe can supply us with wheat? No, sir, these cases prove nothing; they are mere exceptions to the ordinary course of trade.

Having now examined this system of "home industry," I will proceed to look at some of the "examples" on which gentlemen have relied in favor of their scheme. The example of England has been triumphantly appealed to. It is not a little strange, sir, that gentlemen who are accustomed to hold up British institutions, to our scorn and contempt, should now appeal to British example, for the purpose of supporting a policy which they venture to call "American." But England, it seems, has grown great by her restrictive system. If this were true, I would ask, if her greatness affords evidence of the happiness of the people? But it seems that her subjects are prosperous—we have been edified by an eulogium even on her "Poor Laws," and are gravely told that the paupers of England, "have ruddy complexions, and eat beef, and drink tea." Sir, I would not exchange the condition of our hardy sun-burnt yeomanry, enjoying a rustic independence on their own farms, for that of the most pampered menials, or well-fed paupers Europe could produce. The gentlemen seem to think, that the only standard of national welfare is money. Now, I do not underrate the advantages of wealth and power, but I consider the happiness of the people as of infinitely more importance, and am inclined to believe that whatever may be gained in riches or in power, very little addition will be made to the substantial happiness of the people, by enticing them from the cheerful walks of agricultural industry into the gloomy walls a manufactory. The large capitalists of our country may have their incomes enlarged, and their political influence increased, but the laborers will never receive more than very moderate wages. The ablest political economist in Europe now tells us, that Great Britain has become great, not in consequence of, but (to use the language of Lord Liverpool) "in spite of her restrictive system." If gentlemen reason so illogically as to contend that because England is rich, and great, and prosperous, therefore, she has become so from her prohibitory system, may we not, by the same course of reasoning, prove that she has grown great from her monarchical principles, her orders of nobility, or her military, naval, and church establishments? I doubt not her poor laws have had as much influence in this respect as her corn laws. Sir, England is indebted for all that she possesses to the patient industry of her people, her excellent judiciary, her astonishing triumph in science, in arts, and in arms, and her extensive commerce; which has rendered all the world tributary to her greatness. She owes no portion of her prosperity to her restrictive system. Gentlemen will pardon me, when I declare, and I do it in the face of their assertions to the contrary, that the whole history of Great Britain demonstrates the impolicy, nay the folly and absurdity of the system we are now about, on the strength of her example, to adopt. It is emphatically true, that all her manufactures most protected by laws, have advanced least, while those which have been neglected have prospered most. Silk, the creature of bounties, and nourished and sustained by prohibition, is still in a languishing condition. Linen, the next in order of protection, is next in the order of success. Woollen being less protected than these, has advanced beyond them. But cotton, which has been of all others the least favored, has flourished most of all. To prove this, I will refer at once to the highest authority, the official statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Here are his words, taken from a speech, delivered not two months ago, in the British Parliament:

"Now, at this part of the question, I beg the attention of the committee, whilst I trace the progress of the cotton manufacture, and I do so because I feel, and, indeed, it cannot be doubted, that the arguments which now are applied to the change in the silk, would then have been applicable to the cotton manufactures. I know of nothing in the history of commerce—I am not acquainted with any thing in the history of our manufacturing prosperity, that can at all compare with this. It is perfectly true that forty years ago the manufacture of woollens was the great staple trade of this country. In the year 1780, the whole exports of our cotton manufactures did not amount to more than £350,000. In 1785, which was two years after the peace, and when the commerce of the country had in some measure recovered from the difficulties of war, the whole extent of our cotton exports, of every description, did not exceed £864,000, whilst, at that period, our woollen exports amounted to £5,000,000; the proportion between the two commodities being at that time five to one. But how stands the case at present? Why, sir, from that period to the present, that is, from the year 1785 to the year 1822, the cotton exports have arisen to the incredible amount of £33,337,000, [loud and continued cheers,] which is more than forty times the amount of that period. I am now of course speaking of official duties [hear, hear!]. But with respect to the woollen manufactures, the great staple trade in former times in this country, it does not now amount to more than £6,000,000, being not so much as one-fourth the amount of the exports of cotton [hear, hear!]. Why then, when I see the pre-eminent advantage which arises from the circumstance of allowing the capital to run in a free and unrestricted channel [loud cheers;] when I contemplate the benefits which the country has derived from the application of sound principles to this single branch of commerce, am I not justified in endeavoring to prevail upon the committee to extend those principles which have produced such invaluable results? [cheers.]”

Now, sir, am I not fully supported in the assertion that the example of England is decisive in our favor? England is now wide awake to her errors on this subject, and when she is painfully retracing her steps, are we to commence the same unprofitable journey? Let me entreat gentlemen to pause and consider how much more easy it is to find our way into a labyrinth, than when there, to extricate ourselves from its mazes. The British Parliament are, at this very moment, engaged in propositions, submitted by the Ministry and supported by the Opposition, to take away the bounty on linens, and to promote the manufacture of silk, by introducing foreign competition. Indeed, so universal is the conviction in that country, of the impolicy of the restrictive system, that we are assured by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, “that for some time past there has prevailed in that country, amongst its ablest statesmen and most eminent writers, indeed among all men of sense and reflection, a decided conviction that the maintenance of the prohibitory system is exceedingly impolitic,” and he concludes with the expression of a hope, of “yet seeing unrestricted industry.” Let us for a moment, Mr. President, compare the woollen and cotton manufactures of England. It is no answer to our argument to say that the latter have derived some benefit from the restrictions on foreign cottons, for it will be seen that woollen has received tenfold more protection than cotton goods; and their relative progress, therefore, affords a decisive test of the efficacy of the protecting system. Wool was, of old, the great staple of England, and from the earliest periods, received the protection of the laws; whilst the manufacture, and even the use of cotton goods was totally prohibited. Even the dead could not be buried, except in woollen; a regulation, the remembrance of which has been perpetuated by Pope’s celebrated lines in illustration of “the ruling passion strong in death.”

When, at a later period, the manufacture of cotton goods was permitted, the raw material was burdened with a heavy duty, and an oppressive excise was imposed on the manufactured article. The jealousy, however, of the cotton manufacture began at length to wear away, and about forty years ago it was relieved from its burdens I think by allowing a drawback on the excise. Up to that period, wool had been uniformly protected and cotton oppressed, and for the very reason now given by the advocates of this bill, because “the raw material was to be found at home.” Now, how stands the account between these two articles? Why, sir, I have shown that while the woollen manufactures have advanced from five millions of pounds sterling to six, the cotton have progressed from less than one to thirty-three millions.

The gentleman from New Jersey has next appealed to Spain and Holland, as affording living examples of the evils of unrestricted industry. Sir, in my humble judgment the experience of these countries is decisive against him. So far from its being true that Spain has adopted the free system for which we contend, she always has been fenced round by restrictions. “Five centuries ago, even as far back as 1271, (says the intelligent Count De La Borde,) mention is made of the taxes levied on the cloth of Flanders, Paris, &c., their prohibition was the subject of the rescript of the 2d September, 1494.” Notwithstanding restrictions of this kind, however, which have been continued to the present period, we are informed (on the authority of Bourgoanne, a distinguished traveller, formerly French Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Madrid) “that there are only two manufactures of fine cloth in all Spain, though Spain produces the finest wool in Europe, and though, to favor the manufactures there, a heavy export duty has been imposed on wool, and a very heavy duty on imported cloth.” The same writer also mentions that the looking-glass manufacture of Ildefonso, in Spain, could not succeed, and was abandoned, though patronized at vast expense by the Government, which prohibited the introduction of any other glass within a circle of twenty leagues. Spain, then, furnishes, in her example, no argument in favor of the regulating policy.

As to Holland, the gentlemen hold her up triumphantly, as the only nation which ever has acted on the principle of the perfect freedom of trade, and the unrestricted employment of labor and capital, and they seem to take it for granted that the consequence must have been disastrous to that country. But what is the fact? Holland has enjoyed the benefit of free institutions, and her people have not been surpassed in general prosperity by any on earth. Look at that country, sir, rescued from the ocean, the very soil on which the people tread—a conquest, not obtained in a day by force of arms over a mortal enemy, but achieved, by unexampled fortitude and perseverance, over the boisterous elements. Are her merchants poor? Sir, their wealth is proverbial—and what is the condition of the mass of her people—for this, after all, is the only test a republican can acknowledge of national welfare? Sir, I will appeal to the latest traveller in that country—to our fellow-citizen, the amiable and learned Professor Griscom, of New York—what does he tell us? Why, “that he was every where forcibly struck with the healthy and fine appearance of the people.” He observed, “a general taste for science and a diffusion of learning;” he witnessed every where “the triumph of industry and of art,” and even, when he brought Holland into comparison with France and Switzerland, through which he had recently passed, he assures us, “that he was so strongly impressed with the extraordinary evidences of industry, skill, and neatness, that even the monotony of the general level did not offend him;” and yet he saw Holland when not recovered from the continental system and French misrule.

I come now, Mr. President, to the examination of the probable effects of this bill—

1st. On the revenue.

2d. On the manufactures themselves; and

3d. On the cotton-growing States.

On the first point, it appears, from a statement submitted to the other House, by one of our most intelligent merchants, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) and printed by the order of that House, (Document No. 72,) that the bill, in its present shape, will prohibit the importation of goods to the amount of $26,000,000, and cut off $8,000,000 of our revenue. The cotton goods alone, which this bill will exclude, will amount to $7,000,000, the present duties on which amount to $3,000,000. These estimates are supported by the memorial of the merchants of Portland, (who assure us, that the bill will affect the revenue to the amount of $8,000,000,) and by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1820, who, when called upon to state what the effect of prohibitory duties would be on three articles only, viz: cotton, woollen, and iron, answered, that it would impair the revenue to the amount of $6,000,000. Such will be the effect of the bill, should it operate as a prohibition, and if it should not lessen importations, it will impose a tax of $8,000,000, without producing the smallest advantage to any one.

I will next take a brief view of the probable effect of this bill on the cotton-growing States. The people in these States are in the practice of purchasing almost all their supplies from abroad, and directing their whole attention to the cultivation of cotton. With respect to all the articles of our consumption, in relation to which this bill proposes to levy additional duties, there can be no doubt that its operation will increase the price to the consumers. But, this will be the least dangerous and oppressive effect of the measure. It threatens us with the total loss of our market for cotton, rice, and tobacco. When we consider the magnitude and importance of this trade, in a national point of view, I should suppose gentlemen would pause before they adopted any measure which could possibly hazard either its total loss or material diminution.

The whole amount of our domestic exports the last year, was $47,000,000. Of this, cotton alone amounted to $20,400,000—and the three articles of cotton, rice, and tobacco, to $28,500,000—more than two-thirds of the whole amount of our exports. Is this to be lightly and rashly put in jeopardy? But we are asked, whether we believe that the English purchase our cotton from friendship, and whether they will be so blind to their own interests as to retaliate upon us? And the gentleman from Missouri, with great emphasis, has declared “that they dare not do it.” Sir, I know there is no friendship in trade. But, though nations are never influenced by sentiments of kindness towards others yet animosities are sometimes indulged beyond any sound view of their own interests. National pride and resentment, as often as the ambition of rulers, have engaged nations, in what one of our most revered statesmen has called “the unprofitable contest of trying which can do the other the most harm.” All systems of retaliation are of this nature, and our own experience affords, unhappily, several memorable examples of this spirit. England may, therefore, in the spirit of vengeance or of self-defence, engage in a system of retaliation from which both parties may suffer. Is she not already threatening us with discriminating duties on our cotton? And is this bill at all calculated to remove her complaints? But may we not actually make it the interest of Great Britain to pursue that course? If we prohibit the importation of British goods, may it not become the interest of Great Britain no longer to take our cotton, if she can obtain the same article from other countries which will receive her goods in return? If the United States was the only country on the face of the globe that could produce the article, the case might be very different, and England, by resorting to a circuitous trade, might obtain the means of paying for our cotton. Yet a direct trade, which consists in the simple exchange of the commodities produced at home, is in general the most profitable; and undoubtedly, when such a trade can be carried on to the full extent of the productions of any country, no temptation can exist to seek, in a circuitous channel, for the means of disposing of our produce. No trade can be more profitable than that which is carried on between the United States and Great Britain, consisting, as it does, in the exchange of those productions, which, from our peculiar situation, we can most profitably raise for those which her condition enables her most conveniently and cheaply to produce. But should we prohibit the importation of her goods, and she can obtain cotton elsewhere, it will become her interest to supply herself with this article, from those countries which will take her goods in payment. Suppose a British ship to be employed in that trade, if we do not take British goods, she may be compelled to come out in ballast, thereby losing the freight of the outward voyage; but should the same trade be carried on to Brazil, or any other country which will take British goods, such a ship would carry out a cargo of goods, and exchange them for cotton. Can any one hesitate in deciding which of these two would be the most profitable trade to Great Britain? Interest, therefore, as well as resentment, may dictate the course we deprecate. But there is another view of the subject which forces itself irresistibly on my attention; the truth is, that the cotton planters of our country are at this moment engaged in a fearful competition with foreign nations for the possession of the cotton market of the world. The general peace has excited, to the very utmost, the dormant energies of mankind. In commerce our ships are struggling for their existence, and our farmers and planters have certainly no right to expect to escape a similar contest; a contest in which they will assuredly not come off victorious, if the Government shall interfere to keep down their exertions. They are engaged in a glorious race, in which a single pound weight may deprive them of the victory. We have since the peace brought down the price of cotton to the very lowest sum for which it can be profitably raised. As a proof of this, the returns of the last year exhibit an increase in quantity of thirty millions of pounds and a diminution in price of $3,500,000. Now, I would seriously ask my friends, whether this is a period when additional burdens ought to be imposed on the cotton planter? Loaded with debts—contracted during that period of general jubilee, which the people of the United States for so many years enjoyed, with habits of expense rendered almost sacred by the hospitality and kindness with which they are dignified, you propose to bear him down, at the very crisis of his fate, by onerous taxes, odious duties, and oppressive regulations. You will not only increase the expense of every thing he consumes, but you embarrass him in the sale of his productions; compel him either to give an extravagant price for the very clothing of his cotton, or to use an article which will secure a preference to his rivals in every market in Europe. You propose to levy heavy duties on all those articles which he is accustomed to receive in payment for his cotton, and thereby make it the interest of his customers to purchase from his rivals; and you accompany all this by regulations, which, affecting the shipping interest, must greatly increase the expense of transportation. After this, is it surprising that we should feel much anxiety, and manifest great apprehensions of danger? It is easy, sir, for those who do not partake of our dangers, to deride our fears. But let me assure gentlemen that these fears are entertained, not only by the wise, the prudent, and the brave among ourselves, but the unanimous voice on this subject has been re-echoed by all men of intelligence (acquainted with the course of trade) in every part of the United States. Look at the memorials. There is not one, from the Southern States, which does not hold this language. The merchants and tobacco planters of Virginia have warned us of our danger; the merchants of Baltimore have told us, "that if we do not buy British manufactures, she cannot be our customer for the produce of our country," and the Chambers of Commerce of Philadelphia and New York, (composed of some of the first merchants in the world,) have raised their warning voices, in the most emphatic language, in behalf of the cotton planter. Is all this to pass for nothing? Are we still to be told that our fears are idle, and the dangers imaginary? Sir, I will borrow the language of a learned writer on this subject, and say, "let gentlemen look to it—they are not threatening us with a system of 'unjust taxation merely—but with the annihilation of our staple commodities; not with taxation but destruction.'" But we are told that the people of the South enjoy a great advantage in the value of their exports, while the corn growing States cannot find a market for their grain; gentlemen speak of us as the favored of the land, and seem to think it only common justice that our "princely fortunes," and "large incomes" should, in some way or other, be shared with our less fortunate brethren. Now, sir, if it were true that the Southern States did enjoy these pre-eminent advantages, would it follow that any part of their wealth, however small, could be lawfully taken away for the especial benefit of any other part of the Union? Our advantages, whatever they may be, are the result of climate, soil, and peculiar situation; they are the bounties of Providence, and we cannot be deprived of the smallest portion of them, on any principle which would not justify an agrarian law. For our fertile soil, and genial climate, we have paid the price, in great sacrifices of health, of comfort, and of life itself. Even our slave institutions, which gentlemen almost seem to envy, are upheld at a sacrifice of comfort and feeling, which gentlemen are not disposed to estimate. But if the South does, in fact, hold out so many advantages, our doors are open—let gentlemen come and share them freely—we will receive them as brethren, and they shall have our free consent to become nabobs as soon as they please. But let them not expect to share our profits, without breathing the atmosphere of our swamps, and panting under our Summer's sun; without, in a word, paying the price which we pay for them. But I assure gentlemen they are greatly deceived. The people of the South are in no better condition than the rest of their fellow-citizens. They have their full share of debts—of diminished prices—habits of expense, and every other evil, (except, perhaps, paper banks, and a depreciated currency,) which are so severely felt in other parts of our country. I am sorry to be compelled to say, that this bill is so framed as to bear with peculiar severity on the Southern States; to whose feelings almost as little regard seems to be paid as to their interests. Cotton bagging, osnaburgs, plains—articles consumed almost exclusively in that portion of the country, are objects of the special vengeance of the law. Let us examine for a moment this duty on cotton bagging. Here is a manufacture, the raw material of which abounds at home; there is hardly a spot from Florida to Canada which will not produce it abundantly. The manufacture requires neither skill nor capital, nay, we are expressly told, from the highest authority, "that the buildings used for the purpose are of the slightest kind, much resembling rope-walks; the hands, for the most part, small negro boys and girls; and the weavers all negroes, or common laborers."

Sir, whatever may be said of other articles in this bill, it is certain there is no plausible pretext for protecting cotton bagging. The honor, the independence, the defence of the country, do not depend on cotton bagging. It is an article easily made, which requires neither skill nor capital, and which could on no principle claim protection, except, indeed, it should be deemed just and expedient to advance one part of the country at the expense of another. Let me, for the sake of example, show the practical operation of this duty on the city of Charleston, from which some idea may be formed of its injurious effects on the cotton growing States. It appears, from the statements of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce, which have been printed and laid on our table, that there was imported last year into that place, 18,500 pieces of cotton bagging, which cost, on an average, $8 50 per piece, equal to $157,250.

Now it appears from a calculation, which I hold in my hand, and which is at the service of gentlemen, that the difference between the present and the proposed duties on this amount, is upwards of $30,000. And thus, it appears, that on the cotton bagging imported into a single city, this bill proposes to add $30,000 per annum to a tax already sufficiently high for every legitimate purpose. By extending the calculation, it will be easy to show that the Southern States will be taxed on the single article of cotton bagging, to the amount of upwards of $200,000 per annum. But we are assured "that the planter does not pay this tax, as he gets it refunded when he sells the cotton." Gentlemen may be satisfied that there are very few exceptions to the rule that the consumer pays the duty; and who is the consumer of cotton bagging but the planter, who, in clothing his cotton with it puts it to the only use for which it was designed? But the practice in Europe is to allow a tare for the weight of the bag; and even if this were not the case, we may be satisfied that neither the merchant nor the manufacturer would consent to pay for an article which could be of no use to them; and, therefore, if the bagging should be included in the weight, it would be deducted from the price of the cotton. But gentlemen take higher ground, and owning that this duty is "intended to be protective and prohibitory," tell us that "it is only an equivalent for the three cents per pound on imported cotton." We have, Mr. President, been so constantly taunted with the protection which the South has received in the duties on cotton, tobacco, and sugar, that I must be permitted to notice these arguments in this place. It is not true that the duty of three cents a pound on imported cotton was intended to encourage the growth of it, nor that it has, in fact, afforded any protection whatever to that article. The duty was laid prior to the year 1790, when not a pound of cotton was raised in the country, and when none was expected to be raised, and it was merely introduced for revenue, into a bill, which imposed duties on articles imported into the country. It has been stated that the price of cotton was then about twenty-five cents, and if so, the duty was only twelve and-a-half per cent; but, even at the present reduced prices, it is less than twenty-five per cent.; which is actually below the average amount of duties imposed solely with a view to revenue. We deny, positively, that it has afforded us any protection whatever. From our climate, our soil, and our skill and experience in the culture of the plant, we can afford to sell, and actually do sell, cotton, in foreign markets, as cheap as any country in the world. From the moment a pod of cotton was raised in the country, it was seen that competition with us in the home market was entirely out of the question, and it made no manner of difference, whether the duty on the foreign article was one cent or twenty. But when we can export such immense quantities of cotton, and undersell all other nations in foreign markets, where we have no protection, is it not absurd to talk of our deriving an advantage from protection at home? There never has been a period when this duty excluded a single pound of foreign cotton, and if gentlemen will only consent to abandon the tariff bill, we will agree that the duty, of three cents a pound on cotton, shall be taken off immediately.

Now, as to tobacco, the case is precisely the same. The duty is only fifteen per cent., much below the average rate of duties; and in respect to the duties on manufactured tobacco, gentlemen are altogether mistaken in putting that down to the debit of agriculture; the manufacturer, of course, derived that benefit, and it is notorious that Spanish tobacco is chiefly used in the manufacture of snuff and cigars.

The argument of the protection extended to sugar, is more plausible. But it is certain that the duty was imposed merely for revenue, and the protection, if any, has been merely incidental. It was a duty of twelve and-a-half cents per pound, then equal to about twelve and-a-half per cent., and was imposed before Louisiana was acquired, and when no sugar was raised, or expected to be raised in the country. It is true that, in 1816, the duty was increased to three cents, but this was done by the friends of manufactures, notoriously for the purpose of reconciling certain gentlemen from the South to that bill; and perhaps it was right, when extending protection to manufactures, for the friends of the system to extend bounds to other pursuits. Having done this, however, from motives either of policy or justice, it is hardly fair to upbraid us with it. Are not gentlemen, in spite of our protests, proposing to extend further protection to cotton, and to give bounties to the growers of oranges and limes? And I doubt not that, at a future day, this bill will be held up as affording protection to the South. Upon all of these items, I will make a general remark, that, if gentlemen will consent to arrange the tariff exclusively with a view to revenue, and it shall be found, on examination, that the duty on cotton, tobacco, and sugar, is unreasonably high, we will freely consent that they shall be put on a footing of perfect equality with other articles. Before I leave this branch of the subject, permit me, Mr. President, to say one word as to the protection extended to the shipping interest, on which the gentlemen on the other side have descanted so largely and extravagantly. I am not unwilling to admit that some of the laws alluded to may have been designed to promote navigation, with a view to the increase of the number of our seamen. This, if justifiable, can only be vindicated on the ground of the necessity of rearing up a race of men essential to the support of a navy, and consequently the defence of the country. I am not prepared, at this time, to enter into the inquiry, how far the object would justify a bounty to ships. But I will say that, in a national point of view, it is one of vast importance. Invasion cannot be kept from our shores but by a navy, and though the yeomanry of our country would, doubtless, at all times, be able to hurl destruction on any foe who shall venture to march into the interior, yet this might be at an immense sacrifice of men and of money. The true policy of America is to keep the enemy at the door, and to carry on the war on the ocean. Our sailors already amount to seventy thousand—well-disciplined men, certainly surpassed by none—all of whose services we could command in any emergency. I doubt whether this body of men do not add more to our strength than a regular army of the same amount, and they are maintained without expense, and without the smallest danger to our liberties. It cannot be necessary to add any thing to what has been said with so much perspicuity and force, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, on this point. I shall content myself, therefore, with the observation, that, whatever objection may be applicable to the acts in relation to the shipping interest, and however correct it may be to repeal any or all of them, still it is capable of demonstration, that our shipping interest has been more burdened with taxes than our agriculture or our manufactures. The whole amount of domestic products, exported free of duty from 1791 to 1823, was, on an average, $37,330,865 per annum. It appears, from the report of the Secretary of State, made in obedience to a call of this House, that there are goods manufactured in this country, which, if imported from abroad, would, at the present rates, pay duties to the amount of $42,000,000 per annum. These are also duty free. But, is there a single operation of commerce which is not taxed? According to a statement which I have prepared, it is manifest that, if every act of Congress in favor of the shipping interest did operate as a bounty, which has been shown not to be the case, it would only amount to about one million and a half of dollars a year, while the duties imposed on articles used in ship building alone, amount to more than double that sum.

Will gentlemen suffer me to ask them to point out to me, if they can, the power which this Government possesses to adopt a system for the avowed purpose of encouraging particular branches of industry? The power to declare war may involve the right of bringing into existence the means of national defence. But, to tell us we have a right to resort to theoretical speculations as to the most convenient or profitable employments of industry, and that you can, by law, encourage certain pursuits and prohibit others, is to make this not merely a consolidated, but an unlimited Government. If you can control and direct any, why not all, the pursuits of your citizens? And if all, where is the limitation to your authority? Gentlemen surely forget that the supreme power is not in the Government of the United States. They do not remember that the several States are free and independent sovereignties, and that all power, not expressly granted to the Federal Government, is reserved to the people of those sovereignties. When I say expressly delegated, I wish to be understood that no power can be exercised by Congress which is not expressly granted, or which is not clearly incident to such a grant. Now, when we call upon gentlemen to show their authority, they tell us it is derived from the authority to "regulate commerce." But, are regulation and annihilation synonymous terms? Does one include the other; or are they not rather opposites, and does not the very idea of regulation exclude that of destruction? I rejoice, sir, to find that gentlemen refer us to commerce; for the very clause which expressly confers the right to regulate commerce, by saying nothing of the regulation of manufactures or of agriculture, or home industry, seems to demonstrate that they were intended to be put beyond our control, and to be reserved to the people of the States respectively. But our opponents gravely inform us that this is a bill to levy imposts, and that it is, therefore, within the very letter of the Constitution. True, sir, if imposts were the end and aim of the bill. But, surely, gentlemen will not attempt to justify a departure from the spirit, by an adherence to the letter of the Constitution! Will they contend that we could, by law, adopt and enforce the Chinese policy, and by virtue of our authority to regulate commerce, interdict all intercourse with foreign nations? And if you could not do that directly, can you accomplish the same thing indirectly, by levying such imposts as will produce the same result? It may be difficult to draw the exact line which divides the lawful exercise from the abuse of authority—where regulation ceases and unconstitutional prohibition begins. But it is certain, if you have a right to prohibit the importation of cottons and woollens, and cotton bagging, for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, you may, whenever you please, prohibit importations, and shut up your ports entirely. An embargo can only be justified as a branch of the war power, and I think no one will contend, at this day, that a general and perpetual embargo could be lawfully laid. If it be sufficient to adhere to the letter without regard to the spirit and intent of the Constitution; if we may use a power granted for one purpose for the accomplishment of another and very different purpose, it is easy to show that a Constitution on parchment is worth nothing.

I must be permitted, while on this topic, to declare that, however this bill may be modified, still the system is one against which we feel ourselves constrained, in behalf of those we represent, to enter our most solemn protest. Considering this scheme of promoting certain employments, at the expense of others, as unequal, oppressive, and unjust—viewing prohibition as the means, and the destruction of all foreign commerce the end of this policy—I take this occasion to declare that we shall feel ourselves fully justified in embracing the very first opportunity of repealing all such laws as may be passed for the promotion of these objects. Whatever interests may grow up under this bill, and whatever capital may be invested, I wish it to be distinctly understood that we will not hold ourselves bound to maintain the system; and if capitalists will, in the face of our protests, and in defiance of our solemn warnings, invest their fortunes in pursuits made profitable at our expense, on their own heads be the consequences of their folly. This system is in its very nature progressive. Grant what you may now, the manufacturers will never be satisfied; do what you may for them, the advocates of home industry will never be content until every article imported from abroad, which comes into competition with any thing made at home, shall be prohibited; until, in short, foreign commerce shall be entirely cut off. If we go on in our course, the time is at hand when these seats will be filled by the owners of manufacturing establishments; and do you believe that, when a numerous party here, supported by millions of people without, collected together in vast masses in particular districts, shall call upon you with one voice “for a monopoly of the raw material at their own prices,” and shall quote you British authority for their demands, you will dare to refuse? Will you, then, seeing your error, retrace your steps? I fear not. If this language be not now held, is there no ground to fear that men, who have tasted the sweets of your bounties, will soon be found looking to prohibition and monopoly?

Examine, sir, the memorial of Samuel Slater, and others, of Providence, Rhode Island, presented to the Senate at the present session, and printed among our documents, (No. 13.) In page 5 of this memorial we are told—

“That a brief view of the policy of the British Government, in regard to manufactures,” &c., will “indicate the proper measures to be taken by this country, for the security of its own agriculture and manufactures.”

The memorial, proceeding to explain this policy of the British Government, states, that—

“By prohibiting, under penalties, which in some instances touch the life of the offender, the exportation of the raw material of these manufactures; thus giving to the manufacturers at home the monopoly, at their own prices, of those materials, the British Parliament has effectually secured to their own subjects the whole labor of preparing them for the market. The general policy of the system, looking to the most profitable appropriation of the land and labor of the community, seems intended to restrict the productions of the raw material for manufacture, to the actual demand, and, in some instances, to less than the actual demand of the manufacturer.”

Again:—

“But the monopoly at their own prices, of the raw material, &c., and the exclusion from the home and colonial markets of all goods of foreign manufacture, are not the only encouragements extended by the British Government to the domestic manufacturer—the system receives a new impulse from drawbacks, bounties, &c.”

As a proof of the effect of this system, it is stated in page 9—

“That the quantities of wool composing the raw material, are bought by the manufacturer at from 6*d.* to 9*d.* sterling the pound, and would, if they could be exported free of duty to this country, command from 22 to 35 cents per pound.”

Sir, I cannot suppose that these memorialists (who are very respectable men) intended to hold up these monstrous regulations for our imitation; but that they should have been noticed in any language except that of strong indignation, and just reprobation, fills my bosom with serious alarm. The history of Mr. Samuel Slater (who has taken so much pains to make us acquainted with the British policy, in order to indicate the proper measures for us to pursue) is so very curious and instructive, I will notice it as affording the most conclusive evidence that the cotton manufactures are now, and have been for thirty years, one of the most profitable pursuits in this country. I will give it as I received it from several persons in the neighborhood of the place where he resides, and if I am in any respect incorrect, I will thank the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island to put me right. Mr. Slater was an Englishman, bred up a manufacturer, who came to this country upwards of thirty years ago, entirely destitute of funds, or with very slender means. He almost immediately commenced the manufacture of cotton cloth on a small scale, and gradually enlarged his business, until he became the owner of an extensive manufacturing establishment. From that time to the present he has, without intermission, pursued the same trade, and has entered into no other business; and he is now the proprietor of several large establishments, has built up a beautiful village around him, lives in an elegant mansion, has brought up his sons to his own business, and is supposed to be worth, clear of the world, half a million of dollars. He is an honest man and a worthy citizen, highly respected by his neighbors, and presents one of the most splendid examples of successful industry to be found in any country.

Will the gentlemen, after this, tell us that the cotton manufactures were brought into existence by the act of 1816, and must have perished without the aid of that act; or will they venture to assert that skill and prudence, aided by adequate capital, cannot now render profitable a pursuit which has, for thirty years past, handsomely rewarded the labors of this worthy man? One such case speaks more than volumes.

This bill, Mr. President, should it pass, in its present shape, will be inevitably fatal to the manufacturers themselves. It will produce a reaction in the public mind, and they will be swept away before the indignation of the people like chaff before the wind. But this is not all; the idea of a bounty—the very name of protection will invite adventurers, from all quarters, to engage in manufactures, and the business will be grossly and enormously overdone. Sir, I am not unfriendly to manufactures—I shall rejoice to see them rise up gradually, growing with the growth, and strengthening with the strength, of the country; but I wish them to spring up naturally, to arise out of a state of things favorable to their progress, and not to be brought into premature existence by a stimulating process. I do on my conscience believe, that, without any law on the subject, manufactures are advancing, and will continue to advance, as rapidly as the interests of the country require. It must be remembered that we possess only a limited quantity of capital and skill, and, to advance beyond these, will expose us to the danger of introducing ignorance and extravagance into pursuits, the success of which depends on the utmost skill, prudence, and industry. I have taken, Mr. President, some pains to obtain correct information as to the present state and future prospects of our manufactures, and I most deeply regret that gentlemen, who tell us of their languishing condition, had not examined, as I have done, twenty or thirty manufacturing establishments, and beheld the evidences of their prosperity. If the gentlemen had ascertained that some establishments had yielded a clear annual profit of twenty per cent. to their proprietors; that the stock of manufacturing companies is, in some places, fifty or sixty per cent. above par; if they had known that manufactures are advancing with a rapidity unexampled in the history of the world; and that, in a single State, manufacturing companies, with a capital of five millions of dollars, were last year incorporated, I must believe they would hesitate in adopting a measure, founded on the presumption that our establishments are all “falling into decay.” Sir, I may be deceived, but I am thoroughly convinced that the cotton manufacture is the most flourishing branch of industry in the whole country; and though the woollen, iron, and glass, have not been equally prosperous, still, that they now afford reasonable profits, when conducted with skill, prudence, economy, and adequate capital. And it is surely absurd to suppose, that, where these are wanting, any bounties can make such pursuits profitable. Sir, I have not, on this subject, relied exclusively on my own judgment or observation; but I have sought information from the best sources, and beg leave now to submit to the Senate a few facts and statements in support of the opinion I have ventured to express, and for the correctness of some of which I will appeal to my honorable friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD.)

The danger, then, is not that manufactures will not advance with sufficient rapidity, but that their march may be too rapid for the condition of the country, and their own permanent prosperity. No great interest of any country ever yet grew up in a day—no new branch of industry can become firmly and profitably established, but in a long course of years. Every thing, indeed, great or good, is matured by slow degrees. That which attains a speedy maturity is of small value, and is destined to a brief existence. It is the order of Providence, that powers, gradually developed, shall alone attain permanency and perfection. Thus must it be with our national institutions, and national character itself. They can only be formed by time, which is the perfection of all things—“force nothing” was the maxim taught us by WASHINGTON himself. Sir, it is with increased reverence for the character of that great man that I discover, daily, new proofs of the profound wisdom by which his whole life was adorned. It is a remarkable fact, that our country has never yet been placed in any situation in which his actions or his counsels have not been, “a light to our feet, and a lamp to our path.” On the very question before us, “the Father of his Country” (in his legacy to his children) marks out the true American policy, in language which ought to sink deep into our hearts: “Our policy (he instructs us) should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing, by gentle means, the streams of commerce—but forcing nothing.”

When Mr. HAYNE had taken his seat—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed the motion to strike out. He contended that this duty would have the effect to produce a home competition, which would do away our contributions to foreign nations. If it was easily manufactured in the country, and that could not be doubted, he did not see why we could not encourage it, so that it might be manufactured here, to the exclusion of the foreign article. He advocated this duty, not as a Kentucky measure, but as one of great importance to the country at large.

Mr. KELLY submitted some additional remarks in favor of his proposition, and in reference to the prices, &c., of cotton bagging in Alabama. He believed the present existing duty was high enough; but he had conceded to the opinions of others, and had concluded only to move for the striking out of the highest specified duty proposed on this article.

The question on Mr. KELLY's motion was then put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 28. So the highest rate of duty proposed on cotton bagging was stricken out.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, moved to amend the bill in the following clause: “On all manufactures, not herein specified, of cotton, silk, flax, or hemp, or of which either of these materials shall be a component part, a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem,” by inserting, after the word “part,” the words, “excepting Russia, Holland, and Raven's duck.”

SENATE.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the words "and Russia sheetings" were added to the exception.

Mr. BARBOUR moved that "German linens" be also added to the excepted articles. Upon this motion some cursory remarks were made by Messrs. BARBOUR, SMITH, DICKERSON, and LLOYD, of Maryland.

Mr. TALBOT moved that the bill and amendments be ordered to lie on the table; and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business. This was agreed to; and, immediately after the doors were opened, the Senate adjourned.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Dean Weymouth;" and the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine;" with amendments. They have also passed bills, of the following titles, viz: "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of tax;'" "An act for the relief of the administrator of John B. Fanning, deceased, late a purser in the Navy of the United States;" "An act to authorize the issuing a register to the brig William, of New York;" and "An act to allow further time to complete the issuing and locating military land warrants;" in which amendments and bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

THE TARIFF.

The bill from the House of Representatives, to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports," was again taken up for consideration, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. KING, of Alabama, in the Chair.

Just previous to the bill being ordered to lie on the table, yesterday, Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, had moved to amend it by excepting "Russia, Holland, and Raven's duck, and Russia sheetings," from the duty of twenty-five per cent. levied on other cotton, silk, flax, or hempen fabrics; and Mr. BARBOUR had moved to amend the amendment, by adding to it, as another exception, "German linens."

Mr. BARBOUR now varied his motion, by withdrawing the words "German linens," and proposing to add to the exceptions, "Osnaburghs, ticklenburghs, and burlaps." This motion was advocated by the mover, by Messrs. HAYNE, SMITH, BRANCH, MILLS, H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, MACON, HOLMES, of Maine, VAN DYKE, and TAYLOR of Virginia; and opposed by Messrs. DICKERSON, D'WOLF, TALBOT, and JOHNSON, of Ky. It was urged, in behalf of this amendment, that the manufacture of the article had never been attempted in this country; that it was an article of the first necessity, for clothing for the poorer classes of the community, and for servants; and, for these reasons, was not a legitimate object of heavy taxation. On the other hand, it was contended that goods of a similar kind, though not known by the same name, were manufactured in this country—and, being an article of necessity, its manufacture ought to be encouraged, in order to render us independent, for the necessities of life, of other countries.

The question upon amending the amendment, as proposed by Mr. BARBOUR, was then put, and decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Branch, Clayton, Elliott, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, H. Johnson of Louisiana, J. S. Johnston of Louisiana, Kelly, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lloyd of Maryland, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Mills, Parrott, Smith, Taylor of Virginia, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Brown, Chandler, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, McIlvaine, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Seymour, Talbot, Taylor of Indiana, Thomas, Van Buren—24.

So the amendment to the amendment was lost.

The question was then upon amending the bill, so as to except "Russia duck, Holland, and Raven's duck, Russia sheetings," from the duty of twenty-five per cent. which it is contemplated to impose on manufactures of cotton, silk, flax, or hemp. Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, advocated this amendment. Mr. BARBOUR then moved an adjournment, and the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, May 3.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Archibald Clark;" and the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of David Beard;" reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Stephen Brace;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Lemuel Arms;" and the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathaniel Jones;" reported them severally without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. PARROTT, the Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from the consideration of the petition of Thomas Haven and Jonathan Folsom.

Mr. JACKSON, from the joint committee appointed to consider what business is necessary to be acted on at the present session of Congress, and at what time the session may be closed, submitted their final report on that subject; stating that, in the opinion of the Committee, the session of Congress may be terminated on the 10th instant. The report was laid upon the table.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Mareen Duval;" and the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of Elijah Brush," reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Stephen Hurd, and others; reported it without amendment.

The same committee also reported, without amendment, the bill which originated in the Senate, "to enable the President to sell and dispose of the refuse lands of the United States."

Mr. BARTON, the chairman of the committee, stated that the committee believed the system proposed in this bill, incompatible with the full and fair execution of the present system of raising revenue from the public lands, for the discharge of our national debt, as the promulgation of the system now proposed, would have the effect of preventing public sales and private sales at the present minimum price; for few would buy now, when, by waiting a few years, they might get the lands at fifty cents per acre. However proper the proposed plan might become hereafter, the committee deemed it premature and improper at this time; and had therefore instructed him to move the indefinite postponement of this bill, when it shall be taken up for consideration.

The amendments made in the House of Representatives, to the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine," were read, and concurred in.

Mr. NOBLE moved that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Isaac Bussel. This motion was opposed by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine. The question being put, the committee was discharged.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to compensate William Cocke, for certain military services rendered the United States during the late war, and for the relief of John T. Johnson;" reported it without amendment.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Judah Alden;" and the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act approved on the 3d of March, 1819, entitled 'An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices;" reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Fisher," reported it with amendments.

On motion, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing a register to the brig William, of New York;" and the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of tax;" were severally referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amend-

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed, with an amendment to each, the following bills, which originated in the Senate, viz: "An act for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford," "An act for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew;" and "An act for the relief of Amasa Stetson." They have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of Robert Brotherton;" "An act for the relief of Edward Evans;" and "An act for the relief of J. Outramare;" in which amendments and bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

THE TARIFF.

The unfinished business of Saturday, being the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the other House, "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports," was resumed; Mr. KING, of Alabama, was again called to the Chair.

The question was, upon the motion submitted on Friday last by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, to amend the bill so as to except "Russia, Holland, and Raven's duck, and Russia sheetings," from the duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem, which the bill contemplates to impose upon all manufactures of cotton, silk, flax, or hemp.

Mr. BARBOUR rose—he stated that he had moved an adjournment on Saturday, because he felt uncertain how he should vote, in relation to the amendment now before the Senate, after they had refused, by the vote on Saturday, to exempt from taxation articles of the same character, of great importance to a certain section of the country. Upon mature reflection, he had come to the determination to vote against the present amendment, in order that the taxes imposed by this bill might, in this article at least, be equal upon the different portions of the country.

Mr. MILLS spoke in favor of the amendment. He proceeded to show that the article of duck was already taxed very excessively, by the existing rate of duties—and that it was proposed, by this bill, to increase the tax nearly one hundred per cent. upon this article; a tax which would be extremely onerous upon the navigating interest—an interest which was, at least, as much entitled to the forbearance of the Government, as the manufacturing interest was to its positive protection. Mr. M. stated the quantity of the articles included in this amendment, which had been imported into the country within the last year; the revenue that had been paid upon it; and the effect which the duty imposed by this bill, would probably have upon the importation, and upon the revenue. He alluded to the liability of this tax to evasion, by vessels providing themselves with canvass in foreign ports. He commented upon the oppressive operation of this duty, upon the entire commercial interest of the country; the coasting, as well as the foreign trade.

Mr. D'WOLF made a few remarks in opposition to this amendment, and in reply to Mr. MILLS. He spoke of the encouragement which the Government uniformly extended to the shipping interest. He considered the objects of this bill, as being purely national—that many of its items imposed heavy taxes upon the manufacturers—that the bill was calculated to benefit the whole country, and not for the particular profit of any one branch of business. His object, Mr. D'W. said, was to throw the nation on its own resources. He considered the articles we have to carry to market, of a great deal more importance than the wagon we carry them in. He was willing to reduce the duty on duck, but not to strike it out entirely.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, advocated the amendment. He replied to the argument about the national interests to be promoted by the bill. He wished to know what great national interest was to be benefited by this item? He spoke of the small quantity of duck manufactured in the country, and remarked that the national interest was to be promoted by making the consumers in the country pay much higher than they now do for the article. The tax was to bear exclusively upon one class of the community. He warned gentlemen to beware how they go to destroy the shipping interest of the country for the benefit of a few overgrown manufacturers. This, he said, was all that was meant by encouraging home industry, and promoting great national interests. He wished to know in what part of the country duck was manufactured—to what extent—and of what quality. He hoped the honorable gentleman from Virginia would reconsider his determination, and not vote against this amendment because he had been disappointed in that which he had proposed.

Mr. BARBOUR made some further remarks, in which he expressed his uniform attachment to the commerce and to the navy of the country; but he could not consent that the great agricultural interests of the nation should be lost sight of. There was not a solitary item in this bill which would in the least benefit that interest. The cabalistic term home industry, he believed, was only to be applied for the protection of spinning jennies. He was not willing to submit to a heavy and immediate evil, in order to obtain a merely possible benefit in prospect. He was against the whole bill; but, if the tax was to be imposed upon the osnaburges, &c., which were so important to the South, he must vote against this amendment, so as to make that tax, in some measure, equal. The one was to operate upon the commercial, and the other upon the agricultural interest. And, as he could not possibly see why Russia, Holland, and Raven's duck were not as fair objects of taxation as osnaburghs, ticklenburghs, and burlaps, he should feel compelled to vote against this amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Virginia, spoke on this subject. He agreed perfectly well with the gentleman from Massachusetts; but yet he found himself compelled to vote with his colleague. This bill, he said, was to let blood from two of the great interests of the country, in order to circulate it in the veins of the other interest. He feared they would all die under the operation; the two first from loss of blood, and the other from having too much. His object was to make the two interests which were to suffer bear the imposition equally, and to bind them together by their community in suffering. He commented upon the injustice of building up a particular class—a special aristocracy—by the imposition of heavy taxes upon the community at large. He spoke particularly of the duty on wool, an article which could only be produced in a small portion of the country, owing to the circumstances of soil and climate. If this tax was imposed on the Southern interest by means of duties on their coarse linens, he saw no means by which the tax could be made equal, but by levying a duty on the coarse linens issued for clothing the ships of the Northern section of the country. By this means the revenue could be collected equally from each. Mr. T. spoke of the mutual connexion between these interests.

Mr. RUGGLES opposed the amendment. He conceived that his duty would operate beneficially on the agricultural interest, more than any other, as it would go to encourage the growth of the raw materials in this country. In relation to commerce, he believed it would in some measure affect the vessels employed in foreign trade, but that it would not injure the Navy or the coasting trade. He thought it the duty of the Government to encourage the use of domestic articles for the Navy, as we might be reduced to great distress, if we were at war with the nation from whom we receive these articles. He alluded to the difficulty experienced during the last war for soldiers' blankets and clothing. Mr. R. thought, if we were to have a Navy, (and he had always been a friend to it,) we ought to build our ships with American materials, and man them with Americans. He asked, what further protection the commercial interest wished? They had the whole coasting trade of the country exclusively to themselves—a greater encouragement than had ever been extended to manufacturers. He proceeded to remark upon the beneficial effects that would be produced to the nation, by raising its raw materials and manufacturing them, in preference to making use of manufactures of foreign countries, and upon the capacity of the country to do so, to a great extent.

Mr. SMITH had hoped the question on this amendment would have been taken without debate; but, as that course had not been pursued, he felt compelled to submit his views of the subject. He combatted the idea of the protection given to
